In addition to the various types already mentioned, there are a number of professional prerogatives on which depend a man's vocation. That of herald approximates this class, although the Bella Coola consider it rather as a right operative only during ceremonials. Professional prerogatives rest on the belief that a man's ability as a hunter, wood-worker, and so forth does not rest in his innate skill, but upon an inherited right which must be confirmed and validated by the distribution of presents. These can be given at any convenient time when the people have been called together, but, as it is to the man's advantage to have his right made known as widely 424 463 556*

424 as possible, a potlatch is the most suitable occasion. Goods
463 distributed for this purpose are not returnable; they have 556 "become nothing" in the acquisition. The value of presents so bestowed differs enormously; a man who is proud of his prerogative validates it lavishly until he is strong in his vocation, whereas another establishes himself on a lesser scale. The origin
[773] of professional rights, like so many of other kinds, is lost in antiquity and ascribed to the wishes of Alquntin as expressed to the first people. Some of the early settlers came to earth
[551] with definite duties and vocations, each indicated by a special name; others, lacking these, created them through their own enormous power. At the death of one of these incumbents,
424 his name passed to one of his relatives who acted in the same 463 manner as his predecessor after duly validating the name in 553 question. Ever since that time, the owner of a confirmed pro-556 fessional name has been able to perform the functions of the prerogative. This is never a man's sole designation, but merely [551] an addition to those of ancestral, kwiat, nawk, and other types. Like them, professional names are usually willed by their owners, though if this is neglected, one can be revived by any member of the deceased's ancestral family. In such a case, the older people usually decide on a suitable incumbent and suggest the matter to him; if he does not accept, the opportunity is given to another. If a member of the group is eager to validate the name, it is unlikely that anyone would try to [789] forestall him. Ability in certain respects can also be obtained by magical means (I, p. 701), and a member of the ancestral family so endowed is the natural choice for the prerogative in question.

Prerogatives of this kind can be grouped according to the types of vocation included.

THE PROFESSIONS OF RIVER GUARDIAN

463 In the beginning of time, Alquntin is said to have sent 551 down with Qoil, who landed on the mountain behind Qwaqa'a,

NEA Bellacoola NEA

a man, or nuaiza, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience 424 to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it 463 has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this func- 551
tion. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the valid- 693
ation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but [793] non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name or nuaiza has always been able to perform his duties.

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been en- 784
forced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, 825 otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the 226 same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them [515] from seeing the route. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes 841 is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the [562] fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive stakes for olachen nets.

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can be set afloat, and even a canoe which has just been completed [502] must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at [765]
the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences.

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the 688 salmon kind it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the 693 offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river.
The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by his relatives. This punishment is customary in cases of the upsetting of a canoe. Death is the penalty for throwing refuse into the river, particularly during the summer, and until the coming of the white man the River Guardian exacted it without hesitation.

THE PROFESSION OF UTTERING A DRONING CRY

At the appearance of masked figures representing supernatural beings, whether in xaxaxt or kwiwi dances, many of the women repeatedly utter a peculiar, high-pitched, droning cry which adds considerably to the weirdness and impressiveness of the occasion. Ability to do this depends on an ancestral prerogative duly confirmed by the distribution of presents. Many ancestral myths describe how some of the first women were given by Alqantém, or acquired in other ways, the right to drone, and mention is made of the name used by each with respect to this prerogative. Unlike the one previously described, many of the first women possessed this privilege, which is accordingly common at the present time. A name of this type is usually conferred in girlhood, sometimes even in infancy, and being of relatively slight importance may be validated at a ceremony of less dignity than a potlatch. One of these names is Nuxuqmulelaipsa, which has reference to the blue-green sheen of some abalone-shell brought from the east by Raven in the beginning of time, as described in the ancestral myth in which this name is included. For many years there has been considerable laxity with regard to this prerogative, and women lacking it have even been urged to drone in order to add to the solemnity of the occasion and to increase the wonder of the uninitiated.

There is another similar prerogative, enabling the incumbent to drone at mourning ceremonies. In the beginning of time, Smaaw of Kimsquit married Tlátmaitl, the daughter of a Bella Bella chief, who had this right. It has since been transmitted from one of her descendants to another at Kimsquit.

quit. Details of this prerogative were not obtainable, but it seems to follow the general type. 424 767 463

THE PROFESSION OF FIRST BERRY PICKER

All women can pick berries, but in every village there is at least one who has the prerogative of picking the first of every kind. The origin of this right is lost in dim antiquity, but, like all others, each first berry picker has a special professional name embodied in her ancestral myth which must be duly validated before she can function. One of these is Stkwastwâ-nimdn-a, another is ła'ye. Though normally reserved for women, one of these names is occasionally given to a male child, in which case it is said to have been hermaphroditized. No one would dare to pick berries until the legal picker has paraded up and down the sidewalk carrying on her back her picking basket decorated with a representation of the sun, an act which is believed to ripen the berries. 222 424 [463] [551] [562] [532] [789]

"Get ready to pick red elderberries [or whatever species is ripe] tomorrow," she keeps calling out.

The berries may then be picked by anyone. This is repeated for every variety. As far as could be learnt, there was no social mechanism to punish a woman who picked berries before the announcement of the official picker; obedience seems to have been so universal that infractions are said to have been unknown though formerly there may have been some penalty of which even the memory has disappeared. [688] [183]

THE PROFESSION OF WARRIOR

The profession of warrior is another prerogative handed down from the distant past and requiring validation before it can be used. As with other rights of this type, magical means are in many cases employed to make any young man brave and successful, but there are a number of warriors confirmed as such by the distribution of presents at the time of bestowal on them of professional names. At the present time, it is 701 [424] [463] [431] [551]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

701 than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize
156 in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of [463] a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

555 THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

533 either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose [463] songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unsubstantial, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and composi-
[553] tions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made [428] by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and [578] differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

I:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

THE PROFESSION OF CARPENTER

335 As with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their 424 trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they 463 can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man 555 who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of presents. The latter may be so clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transmitting a professional carpenter's name, however, an [553] effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make 335 canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the 773 beginning of time, Yulätimut was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe [829] the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yulätimut married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the 335 old days, before the coming of the white men, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. [554] Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, [177] and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white men, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the car- [532] penter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

THE PROFESSION OF HUNTER

224 424 Another profession which is entered by means of an ancestral prerogative is that of hunting. Many Bella Coola have [463] validated their right to this vocation, some by confirming names created by their early ancestors, others by legalizing those brought down from above in the beginning of time. [551] One of the latter is Lalaimkila, "The Brusher Off," so-called because the owner is such a successful hunter that he can sweep mountain goats from the mountains as easily as an ordinary person can brush insects from a wall. Unlike the professions of carpenter and singer, it is believed that legalization of a hunter's name always brings success to the holder; perhaps because everyone is more or less successful, it follows [555] that whatever good fortune is achieved by a professional hunter can be attributed to the validation of his prerogative. Others, [556] lacking this assistance, may be proficient, but their success never carries with it the social prestige gained by a man who has distributed goods to substantiate the prerogative.

224 424 184 There is a difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as to whether or not certain hunting methods are inheritable prerogatives. With the introduction of rifles, these have long [177] been discontinued, and no definite information was obtained regarding the social position of their users. Several of the older men believed that the contrivances depended upon ancestral prerogatives, whereas others stated that they were merely individual discoveries which could have been, and in many cases were, imitated by anyone. It seems probable that most of the following practices are prerogatives, although it may be that they are no more than special hunting devices suitable only in certain areas and, therefore, limited to the members of the ancestral family owning that particular locality.

223 424 The method about which the most definite information was obtained, was one formerly employed by a certain Nuxalxiq to catch geese at Tāl·io. According to one elderly Bella Coola,

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

121 128 If I were to investigate and report on the Bella Coola at the present time, I would undoubtedly be influenced by many years of contact with American anthropologists and their work. I would assume a greater knowledge of North-West coast institutions, less interest in the details of ceremonial rites, and it would be impossible not to avoid comparisons with, and observations upon, the theoretical implications of many of the facts recorded. But though every field investigator is strictly objective as to the facts he collects, yet his interests, and his method of presenting them, are coloured by his background; in my case, by the older school of English anthropology. On the whole, I think this is fortunate. It means that the Bella Coola are portrayed as I saw them when I came fresh to a new field, practically uninfluenced by problems of North-West coast culture, and fully prepared to throw myself into their life. They were "my people," not a group in which I was interested because they had, or had not, certain culture traits with which I was concerned. In the course of my teaching experience, furthermore, I have wished repeatedly to give serious students detailed field monographs in which are recorded the interwoven social, religious, and folk-lore concepts of a people, the sum-total of their mental life, collected by one man at one time. This I have tried to do for the Bella Coola.

123 Following the English tradition, I wish to record how this material was collected. Before leaving for British Columbia, [115] I was advised by the late H. I. Smith, who had worked in the area, to talk to Joshua Moody (see Plate 2), an elderly Bella Coola Indian with whom Smith had worked. On explaining to Joshua that I had come to record in permanent form the traditions and lore of his people, Joshua grinned broadly and promised his help. Unfortunately, he spoke only a few words of English. I tried interpreter after interpreter, Indian and white, with only fair success, and my difficulties increased with the [464] opening of the canning season and the consequent employment of the younger men and women. I was urged to learn the [122] Chinook jargon, which serves widely as a lingua franca on the [198] coast, and began the study with much misgiving. The results were surprisingly satisfactory.

After a few weeks I found that I had sufficient knowledge of Chinook to dispense with interpreters and deal directly with the older people, a tremendous advantage. Pride of ancestry is one of the strongest characteristics of the Bella Coola, and once convinced of my sincere interest in and respect for their history, they were willing to talk. They resent the condescension with which most white men regard them, so that contact with one who was friendly and sympathetic came as a pleasant surprise. There were, of course, difficulties. The canning season had begun and every able-bodied man was working away from the village. The conviction of each person that he was the best source of information, and that conferences with another were useless or unreliable, caused distrust. The desire of each informant to discuss only what interested him; the complexity of Bella Coola life itself; the necessity of checking every statement, and the extreme difficulty of doing so on account of discrepancies in the myths of different families; the fear, almost groundless, of each individual that someone else had infringed on his rights by recounting some legend; and, not least, the need for tact, patience, and a sense of humour under all conditions, were some of the obstacles to be surmounted. Nor was Chinook entirely satisfactory. It has enough words for matters pertaining to fishing, hunting, and trading, but for the realms of sociology or theology it is inadequate. This difficulty could not have been overcome without the patient help of my informants. Animated by the desire to help, they used every expedient in the way of parallel and synonym to explain obscure terms. Sometimes a younger man was called in for some abstruse meaning; more often it gradually became clear from different applications. Once the significance of a word was definitely understood, I made a note of it and used it henceforth. A useful vocabulary was thus built up, and conversations were carried on in mixed Bella Coola and Chinook, eked out by whatever English words were known by the person with 182 for a few months each summer. The decline of ceremonials has left a blank in their lives, too easily filled, alas, with drinking, idleness, and vice. It is inevitable that the old rites and old ambitions should pass, but the prohibition of these before new ones had taken their place, has been disastrous. The Bella Coola have lost their pride, a calamity as fatal to a people as to an individual.

177 their earning ability and a man can satisfy his wants by working

They have shown undoubted ability in developing such of their own talents as fit the needs and requirements of the white man. Expert carpenters for generations, they have readily [322] learnt the use of new tools and now build houses and boats of considerable constructional skill. They have proved them- [464] selves valuable employees of the canneries which rely to a large extent upon Indian labour. Under instruction from a [533] white teacher, a number of the younger men have formed a band which gives creditable performances with wind and percussion instruments. One can only deplore the fact that the skill of the Bella Coola in carving, painting, acting, singing, composing, and story-telling could not have been guided into channels where it would have developed and added lustre to the new world in which they find themselves.

The white man's civilization presses forward as an overwhelming flood, blotting out the cultures of lesser peoples in all parts of the world. This is inevitable, probably it is well that it should be so, but it offers little consolation to a tribe like the Bella Coola. Their life has been destroyed; and, wonderingly, half-proudly, half-plaintively, the survivors watch the downfall of all that their ancestors cherished. Too often the white man fails to understand this; too often he fails to realize that progress, as he sees it, is wiping out valuable elements of civilizations other than his own instead of seeking the good in them and preserving it for the benefit of himself and the native alike. The Bella Coola culture is dying, and with it will pass forever something created by a Canadian people, not great perhaps, but ineffably stamped with their personality.

SYMPATHETIC MAGIC AND WITCHCRAFT AMONG THE BELLACOOLA

By HARLAN I. SMITH

177 754 789 [797] 658 464 MANY OF the Bellacoola Indians today believe in sympathetic magic and witchcraft, after over a hundred years of contact with white men. Most of them live within hearing of the bells of the mission church, and the government school. Not a few of the men take logging contracts; some of them build and operate motor boats; many of them join the fishing fleets of the salmon canneries; most of the women work in the canneries; and all deal at the white men's stores.

101 131 [161] The Bellacoola lived at the heads of the long inlets half way up the Pacific Coast of Canada and in the tributary Bella Coola valley. Now, numbering perhaps two hundred and fifty, they, with the exception of a few families, are concentrated on one reservation at the mouth of the Bella Coola river. The Bella Coola valley has been called the Norway of Canada. This was where Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to cross Canada overland, reached the sea.

105 Aboriginally, the Bellacoola were of the North Pacific Coast culture of America, which is characterized by the extensive use of red cedar and sea products, particularly salmon, the making of graceful, sea-going canoes, each hewn from a single cedar, the erection of large rectangular houses made of cedar planks, with carved house posts and totem poles, lack of pottery, and expertness in carpenter work, carving, and painting. This culture belongs to the barefoot area, but the Bellacoolas wore moccasins to a certain extent. The art of the area was that best known from the paintings and carvings of the totem poles, largely of conventionalized animal forms. The life centred around a very highly developed social organization, an extensive and powerful financial system, and property rights to names, rituals and honors. The Bellacoola language is one of the Salish linguistic stock. They are built. The central fire is laid in the bottom of the pit, a few feet above that is the platform where the guests are seated, and the ground-level is a few feet above that again. A few instances are remembered of houses having been built with two, and even three, of these tiers, or platforms. In those cases it appears certain that this type of construction was embodied in a myth derived from Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people, where, according to the Bella Coola, large houses, of five or six tiers, were not unknown. 342 424 556* [177]

X uses his own discretion in choosing his workmen,[1] avoiding only his own relatives and those of his wife. The question of pay is never broached, but it is understood that X will recompense those who have worked for him. The scale on which he does so will depend entirely on his generosity. This is one of the ways in which a chief helps the poor people of his village. More food is distributed to "sharpen the wedges." 335 556* 465

While a man is engaged on his allotted task any food or other articles which he or his family may obtain belongs to X. If a man who hews the planks takes his wife with him and she chances to pick berries while he is at work, these must be given to X who will distribute them with his other food at the potlatch, and it will be announced from whom he has received them. If a man's friends should help him to complete his task and then all go hunting, any skins acquired will belong to X; but when he repays his indebtedness he is expected to reward the worker, not only for his carpentry, but also for the berries or pelts. As X must give lavishly to prove his chief-like generosity, the collection of foods or skins by his workmen is profitable for them.

The guests have been passing in and out of X's house all day and towards dusk all again assemble within. Suddenly the door is burst open by a number of young men carrying a large log, like a battering-ram. The majority of the bearers are nsek, though they may obtain assistance from those who are not members of the society. The people within the house spring up to eject the ram, and a sham battle ensues. Back- 556* [575] which X has amassed. These have been collected in boxes near the fire where he, aided by members of his family, is constantly poring over the question of their proper distribution. One or two fluent chiefs have been chosen by X to act as speakers, and, as he tells them which gift is to be given to which man, the speaker holds up the article in question and announces the name of the recipient. It is also proclaimed from whom, and for what reason X has received each assortment of goods, thereby making known the names of those who have contributed. In this way a man is glorified who has repaid with large interest a debt owing to X. In the case of skins or rolls of cloth, the goods about to be given out are held outspread by several people at their full length, prior to being torn into strips. Each beneficiary accepts what is coming to him from the hands of the young men who act as deliverers without displaying either gratitude or disgust, whether or not the present comes up to his expectations. The point of view is that the matter concerns X alone; on his generosity depends his status in the community. 556*

The first gifts distributed are actually payments, though never referred to as such. The Bella Coola consider that X is under obligations to those who have helped him prepare for the potlatch and that he is discharging these obligations by presents. The carpenters who have made the new house, the totem-pole, and other objects used in the rites, must be rewarded, likewise the singers who have composed the songs, the messengers, the women wailers, the masked dancers, the announcers who even now are distributing the goods, the boys helping with the cooking, the guests who make speeches—one and all have to be compensated. It is an anxious time for X, as he must not overlook any of these functionaries. Paper and pencil are now used to assist the memory, but long ago the only aids were bundles of sticks. No system of symbolism was evolved, each man merely chose a stick and designated it in his mind as a reminder to pay such or such an individual. The 556* 465 [211]

* 552 skill shown by those who assisted, as well as the generosity of
● 465 X, regulates the disbursements.

The following presents of money were given at a potlatch held about 1890, and were considered reasonable.

For painting two designs[32] on the front outside wall of the house	$ 40.00
For the erection of four upright posts, supporting the walls and roof of the house	30.00
For each longitudinal beam with painting	20.00
For each cross-beam, without painting	10.00
For the planking of the side walls[33]	100.00
For painting the rear wall of house, which is also the outside wall of the back-room[34]	40.00

426 The next distribution is of goods to repay debts which X
*556 has incurred at previous potlatches, that is, to return "investment presents" then received (I, p. 232). This is known as lisdjut, "repay," and the word is applied to all kinds of repayments, including revenge. One of a chief's difficulties is to remember his indebtedness. He may have been a guest at twenty potlatches, and at each has received presents varying in value, not only from different donors, but from other people [867] associated with them. To keep these accurately in mind is hard but essential, and parents carefully train their children to do so.

As previously mentioned, the Bella Coola have no fixed scale of interest on debts. Careful inquiries made on that point disclosed the idea to be entirely foreign. The greater the interest, the greater does the donor show himself to be. If, for example, X received an investment present of one hundred blankets from a Bella Bella chief ten years previously, [532] [342] [32]When two are painted, that on the left of the central door on entering portrays X's father's crest, that on the right his mother's.

[33]Four men would work together on this task.

[34]Two men would work together at this, the choice of designs corresponding to those of the outside front.

* 556 assistant blows a whistle, sounding like an eagle. When the 575 figure has disappeared into the back-room, the heralds discuss with one another in a loud tone of voice how that was the form [535] in which the initiate's ancestor appeared long ago. At the present time there is uncertainty concerning the proper ritual connected with the appearance of the tutuinam at this juncture.

A senior sisaok then calls on X to bring forward goods, "to shield our eyes from the supernatural being." These articles, part of which may have been provided by relatives of the initiate, are piled beside those brought forward by X's wife, which may also have come from the same source.

The two assortments of goods are now distributed. First, those provided by X are presented to the singers who composed [465] the songs for the initiates, to the carpenters who made the masks, the heralds, and announcers, and any others who have assisted; if any remain they are presented to the stranger-guests. Then the goods which are "mats for the dancer's feet" are distributed, entirely to the guests, and are said to have "become nothing" or to have "flowed away" in the transaction. Neither set of goods is returnable. These presents validate in the eyes of the guests, the right of the initiate to membership in the sisaok society.

Then a second, third, or fourth neophyte is called out, one at a time, and the same procedure is repeated.[41] In distributing the goods, efforts are made to remember those guests who received nothing at the first distribution.

Toward dawn, one of the important chiefs, it is immaterial which one, calls out:

"I want a siki."

[789] It is understood that for this part of the ceremony a foreign expert is required, and one such comes forward according to previous arrangement. He retires to the back-room and re-

[41] Though desirable, it is seldom possible for all the initiates to dance on the same night.

There now remains only the necessity of removing from the house itself the supernatural power with which it is firmly believed to have been impregnated throughout the many weeks of the ceremony. Should this not be done, it would be so strong that only nuxuk could thenceforth live in it, and no hamat rite could be performed therein. One of the senior chiefs, acting on X's behalf, requests as many siki as are present to go to the back-room. At the same time a drum is beaten slowly. The siki call out loudly, in unison, hoip four times. The whistles sound from the back-room with ever-increasing intensity, as if the supernatural being, whose voice they are, were going away. It is said that this practice has been comparatively recently adopted from Rivers Inlet: there used to be nothing of the kind. The siki re-emerge, and one of them stands behind the fire with his stick which he beats on the floor and calls on the audience to shout with him, "hi . . ." This is done four times. It serves to purify the house from the supernatural power with which it has been saturated. The people then disperse, without food.

Goods from the general store are reserved to pay these men for their services, and also for cleansing the initiates from the powers with which they have been imbued, a rite that takes place the following morning in the presence of several siki alone. The initiates are brought from the back-room and seated in a close circle between the door and the fire.* A foreign siki is chosen by X to perform the actual cleansing rite. He has been asked beforehand and has come provided with a long pole and some soiled clothing. It is immaterial whose this is, provided that it has been in contact with a human body; the most potent articles are commonly cedar-bark pads.

The siki covers the young man with a large cedar-bark mat. Then he fastens the clothing or pads to his pole and holds the end in the fire until they are smouldering. Then he swings it four times over the heads of the initiates and throws the stick with the objects back on the fire. In some cases four sets of cloths are used. This rite, which is regarded as very important, frees the lads from the supernatural powers with which they have been endowed, and permits them finally to leave the back-room and return to normal life, just as their earlier cleansing freed them from the tsetsiwas. During their period of seclusion no initiate can perform a kaxiw ceremony of any kind. The supernatural beings of the two seasons, though closely akin, are yet independent, and it would be unthinkable for a man to come into contact with the two at the same time, unless he should be the owner of a rare prerogative enabling him to do so. Only a few men have the right, which undoubtedly was derived either from the Bella Bella or the people of Rivers Inlet.

X pays the functioning ulki with new clothing. This completes the whole ceremony. The guests either return home or adjourn to some other house where a potlatch is taking place, but no rites mark their departure.

Such, then, are the principal features of the Bella Coola potlatch. Without making a careful comparison of its features with those of neighbouring tribes, the following points stand out with great clearness:

(1) The basic concepts of the potlatch in Bella Coola are the same as those of the rite practised elsewhere on the coast.

(2) A potlatch has not the same importance at Bella Coola as it has on other parts of the coast, especially among the Kwakiutl. All informants stated emphatically that they did not carry their potlatches to the same lengths as did the "foolish" Kwakiutl, nor were they as keen financiers. A Bella Coola would never entirely impoverish himself by lavish giving.

(3) The potlatch, though fundamentally the same as it is elsewhere on the coast, has certain rites characteristic of the locality. The central Bella Coola feature, the return of a dead ancestor, is not equally important elsewhere. It would be interesting to be able to trace the history of this. The most as easy as possible. Women seldom experience difficulty and suffer, on the whole, less than do white mothers. It is believed that Sisiutewas, though invisible, is present on every occasion; the rendering of assistance at childbirth is his one kindly act.

The umbilical cord was formerly cut with a mussel shell, but for many years the use of a metal knife has been customary. The after-birth usually comes away easily, but if there is delay hot ashes are placed around the feet and at the back of the woman to accelerate its expulsion. It is immediately buried or placed beneath a large tree in the forest; if burnt, the infant will always be weakly. While one of the assistants disposes of it, another washes the new-born child. The cloths and dishes used for this purpose are burnt; failure to do so is believed to cause the child to become blind through a white film forming over the eyeballs. Then the mother and midwives return to the house with the infant, who is a source of tremendous interest to the community. It is proper for the fathers to compensate the attendants at once, in accordance with their skill and his generosity. A woman who has had several children often assists the daughter of a friend, then, as she gains more experience, her reputation grows and her help is more commonly sought. At the time of this study, 1922, the sum of $5.50 was considered suitable recompense for a fairly proficient midwife.

A new-born child takes the breast readily and a mother would be considered harsh indeed if she failed to suckle her infant whenever it cried, since scientific hours for feeding are not known. A child is wrapped in a shawl or a blanket and carried by the mother wherever she goes; when in the house [illegible] When the umbilical cord falls, it is preserved by the mother. Soon after birth, the parents make provision for their child's welfare by magical means (I, p. 700). The heavy infantile death-rate of the Bella Coola cannot be attributed to lack of love or care on the part of parents, but the attention lavished is commonly not of the kind that assists a weakly child to survive the perils of infancy.

to whom they are going, and for what purpose. He says, for example:

"Fifty skins become nothing on the path of Kalikas."

Everyone knows that this means the expenditure of that amount for the singing of a mourning song in connection with the myth in which Kalikas appears. Gifts must be given for each song, and it is the desire of the donor that they be of fitting value. So, too, in the validation of professional mourners conferred. The goods having thus been displayed, a first distribution, called "Tears" with reference to the donor's grief, is made, each guest receiving a gift of the same worth. It is not returnable, being the implication of the ceremony he has just witnessed. This is followed by donations to the carpenters, the singers, the professional mourners, and all others who have rendered assistance; in essence, these are pay, though they are always referred to as free-will gifts made in gratitude for services rendered. Like the last, they are not returnable. Finally, any goods remaining from the store that has been brought out are given to chiefs and other influential members of the audience. Though not closely owned, the recipients know that these are really investment-gifts; when they reciprocate, they mention that they are repaying a gift made at a memorial potlatch. A plentiful meal is now served, during which several chiefs make complimentary speeches, and the gathering breaks up.

In former times, when features of the ordinary potlatch were borrowed from a memorial potlatch, the ceremony just described was the central point of the proceedings. It was this public song-recital of the journey taken by his deceased relative which mourners sat about a narrow one-thing fire with pride. A few days after, in the late afternoon, the heralds called back the guests and the songs were sung and re-sung. Miniature totem-poles were not used, nor were professional mourners in evidence; the sole function of the gathering was to provide opportunity for learning the songs. They were repeated until far into the night, when a large meal was served and the guests these various amounts making $884, when added to the previous $410.*

It was first decided to give a present to everyone as "Eagle Down Shaken Off by the Dead Woman." Captain Schooner and his assistants thought first of the bottom house in the village, remembered who lived in it, then, after a little more discussion, agreed upon the amount each should receive. This was whispered to Nebuchadnezzar, who held up a bill and called out, for example:

"$10 for so-and-so."

A number of young men had volunteered as messengers and one of them took the money to the designated recipient. After giving to all in the bottom house, they passed to the next house, and so in succession for the whole village. Absentees were remembered and their presents received by friends or relatives. Easier names were used because Nebuchadnezzar was unfamiliar with the little-used aboriginal designations. Contrary to ancient usage, the amounts varied; some chiefs received as much as $10, a child, $1, or 50 cents. Each recipient accepted his gift without showing whether it was more or less than he had expected. There was not sufficient change, so that five persons were often named together and a $5 bill given to the first mentioned for sharing with the other four, a transaction always carried out honestly. Many of the Carriers were strangers, so they could not be rewarded in accordance with their rank, but $50 was given to one of their chiefs to share as he thought fit.

Not all the money was distributed in this way. Payments had to be made to those who had assisted at the funeral. Gifts were bestowed upon the women who had washed and dressed the corpse; to the men who had helped to make the coffin; to the canoe-men who had brought the body to Bella Coola; to the pall-bearers; to the grave-diggers; to the woman who had carried the fire; to the singers, especially to those who had composed the tunes used; to the carpenter who had prepared and used the masked figure; to the members of the band, including a payment for their services whenever Dan Nelson's child should die; to a carpenter to erect a fence around the grave; to another to cut the representation of an eagle on a stone to be erected over the grave; to the speakers at the funeral; to the speakers at the rite then taking place; to those who delivered the money; to the youth who, with pencil and paper, assisted in keeping accounts; to the cook, and to all others who had assisted in any manner. In every case the amount was announced, the bill held up, the name of the recipient stated, the reason for his reward, and the money was then taken to him by a messenger. Captain Schooner really decided how much each should receive, he being in the best position to judge what was suitable, and there being no fixed scale of charges to help him. Work paid for in advance, such as the erection of the fence, was carefully carried out. 465 769 556* [764]

A little money had been kept to validate the assumption of ancestral names by several children of the Schooner family. Everyone received a small amount, a child sometimes as trifling a sum as 25 cents. Captain Schooner had virtually chosen who was to receive which designation, although he received advice from all his relatives. Harry Schooner's infant was given the name, Pätätäwa, a reference to the manner in which the first beams of the morning sun strike the lofty summit of Mount Nuxpalst. Reuben's son was called ällnäls, a Swalk'el designation connected with the crash when the first Sonq' fell. The myths in which these names were embodied were not expounded; in fact, they had been almost forgotten, even by Captain Schooner. Tälös Jenny wished to transmit one of her names to Andy Schooner's infant; this was announced in the same way as the others and validated with them by the gifts to all. Jenny had not contributed to the common stock, but some of it was used with the understanding that she would later repay. Nebuchadnezzar announced the 769 556* 553 425 called out to him, and then remembered no more. It was obvious that she had seen a ghost.

It is over diseases caused by ghosts that a shaman from the dead has power. If a person picks up and eats any morsels which he has dropped he will usually suffer, because, though he thinks the crumbs have fallen, they have really been pulled from his hands by a hungry ghost, who thus showed his desire for food. By picking up and eating the fragments, the man thwarts a dead person who retaliates by forcing some sickness into him. Ghosts may visit this land of the living and ask their relatives for food or clothing, but mortals, unable to hear the speech of the dead, are unaware of the requests of their deceased relatives, and so do not answer them. The irritated ghosts respond by causing sickness. In such cases a shaman from the dead is able to suck out the cause of the ill, and sometimes to display it as a bone, twig, or other small object and at the same time to tell the sufferer what it was that his relatives desired. Like ordinary shamans, a shaman from the dead uses his own discretion whether or not to employ the violent beating of sticks, and like his fellow-practitioner receives payment from those whom he has helped. There are no fixed charges, but a successful shaman is always wealthy.

The intimate contact of ghosts with shamans has already been mentioned in connection with the ability of the latter to learn from the ghost of a murdered person whom he believes to be his slayer.

There is one method of sacrificial curing practised by shamans from the dead alone. If the sickness refuses to yield to ordinary methods, the practitioner makes ten cedar-bark vessels, fills these with grease and places them near the fire, one between it and the door, one on the inner side, and four on either side of it, parallel to the side walls of the house. By each vessel are placed two small wooden figures, roughly carved to represent men, and decorated with dyed and undyed cedar-bark. After endeavouring to suck forth the disease, with or without the assistance of the frenzied beating of sticks, the has gone contrary to something about which there has been universal agreement for generations. 771 754

To understand Bella Coola medicines it is, therefore, necessary to regard them as concepts deep rooted in tribal history, and made potent by the suggestibility of those who practise them. This can be most clearly illustrated with regard to those effecting death, but is equally true with regard to all medicines, whether curative or causative. 828 [184] [755]

There remain for consideration the sociological aspects of medicines. Knowledge of most remedies has been handed down for generations as the property of ancestral families. Some are acquainted with one or two "cures," some with many, and some with none at all. The name of the discoverer of a particular medicine is usually lost in antiquity, though it is often attributed to someone described in the family's myth. Like other possessions based on mythology, a remedy of this type can be practised by any member of the group to which it belongs. If it is observed that a certain individual is using one of these successfully, others will ask him to apply it for them. Payment is always expected, but the sum varies enormously, depending upon the efficacy of the remedy, the difficulty of operation, the generosity of the person benefited, and so many diverse factors that no general conclusions can be made. A patient may observe the details of the treatment, but unless he is entitled to it, he would never dream of using it himself. This is due not only to honesty, but to the conviction that only a person with the inherited right to a certain cure can perform it successfully. Rarely, such knowledge is sold or given away outright, but, like other possessions of an ancestral family, this usually leads to friction and jealousy on the part of those overlooked. Some of the simple herbal remedies are common knowledge and are used by all, since remembrance of their ownership, if it ever existed, has been lost. At the present time it is difficult to learn details of proprietorship of some medicines, but these are indicated whenever possible. 424 755 757 [614] [465] [614] [426]

The making of the masks

*575 796 532 [431] is allotted to different ɬaɬaxiat, usually in accordance with the dancer's wishes, although a marshal normally gives out the actual tasks. The dancer, or one of his relatives, bestows presents on each person to whom work is allotted. The evening of nuxiaɬlap is called ɬmiliɬmkum.

*465 [104] The third day is qutlum. Those to whom mask making has been entrusted assemble early in the dancer's house to start their work. About noon they are provided with a meal, to which other ɬaɬaxiat may be invited. By late afternoon, when most of the work has been accomplished, the chips are carefully swept up and burnt, and the house tidied, ready for the uninitiated who will be invited during the evening. On either this *575 796 day or the one preceding, a platform, with raised sides, is built behind the fire on which the dancer can conceal himself and where he is supposed to remain during the remainder of the four days. About dusk the ɬaɬaxiat are called in; the singers take their places behind the fire, Cannibals, Breakers, and Scratchers are in one of the back corners, where a matting enclosure may have been constructed for them, and the remainder group themselves without distinction around the walls. In Kimsquit, though not in Bella Coola, one or more [184] of the masks may be displayed, suspended from a sloping pole behind the fire. If the singers think it necessary, they may [539] practise the dancer's two songs once more. Then the uninitiated are called in, taking their places near the doorway. The singers beat out one of the dancer's songs and he dances in time to it, and the same is repeated for his second song. After some delay, which appears to be one of the requisites of every ɬaxiat performance, the singers strike up the songs of either a novice or a ɬaxiat, especially one who has already had a call during the ceremonial season, and the one thus summoned dances to his two songs. Late in the season, when many ɬaɬaxiat have performed, only one song may be used, to prevent the ceremony dragging out to an interminable length, and songs of previous years are omitted. In any case, the ritual lasts for most of the night. When all have danced, the Xuu—.

This meaningless ejaculation, spoken as if by X, has the virtue of causing the tree to fall gently. The logs are cut into sections and as many provided as will be needed, since it is contrary to ẖuciut custom for more than one trip to be made for wood. Towards dusk the cutters return, each carrying a burden by means of a tump-line across the forehead. The wood is laid softly on the floor, for it would be a gross insult to throw it down roughly. Meanwhile heralds are summoning the ẖuẖuciut with a call of: [784] [313] [789] [482] [203]*

Nuciutilrap ẖuẖuciut.

X has long since consulted his relatives on the one hand and the marshals on the other, concerning the number of masks to be used, and the beings to be portrayed. A mask of Awtlkwulnuic is prepared for every ẖuciut dance, but with this exception there is no uniformity in the representations. A man always shows his patron, as well as any beings intimately connected with him. Thus X must have a mask of Nuẖkynum, many of his passengers, and the supernatural beings who meet him at the mouth of the river. A present must be given to the carver of every mask, hence their actual number depends upon the expenditure X and his relatives are willing to make. [431] [465]

At dusk the ẖuẖuciut are summoned by the heralds. X is with the marshals behind the fire and he heeds their advice as to the best carpenter for any special mask. When all have assembled X holds up one of the blocks of wood, calls on one of the ẖuẖuciut by name and says: [203]*

"For Nuẖkynum," or whatever may be the figure required.

As the carpenter comes forward to take the billet the heralds call out: [203]*

"Pay attention to him," and as the carpenter takes the wood, X calls out at the top of his voice, xuu—. [789]

shals tells a herald to call them in; they enter joyfully, though somewhat fearfully, and stand or crouch on either side of the doorway. In Kimsquit they gaze on the masks, wondering what they are. The singers strike up the first of X's songs and he dances, while singers and kukusiut men sing the words and the women drone. To the uninitiated it appears most impressive and desirable, while even the prosaic white man can hardly remain indifferent. At intervals a whistle, which the uninitiated believe to be the voice of the call, sounds eerily from beneath the armpit of a reliable kusiut. After a short interval, X's second song is sung, and so in succession the eight. Then the singers strike up any well-remembered tune, perhaps one used last year, and the owner dances. This is repeated for eight or ten songs. At later qothm, every kusiut who has had a call during the season must dance; the ceremony tends, therefore, to become longer and longer as time goes on, although the singing of the songs of a previous year is omitted. When enough performers have danced, a shaman's song is often sung and the owner dances "to clear the house." At this point the uninitiated spectators are told to withdraw. Then a meal is served to the tisaak who, as members of a similar organization, are honoured guests and have been seated together in a corner, resplendent in their weasel-skin ornaments. After their departure, the kukusiut eat more leisurely, while one marshal after another advises them as to their conduct. Then presents of comparatively small value are distributed. The marshals would consider it unbecoming for X to provide over-lavishly. The first gifts are to the singers, the next to the makers of the masks. Though these presents are, in essence, pay, they are never thought of in that light; X is under obligations, X has cleared himself of those obligations, is the Bella Coola attitude. When all is over, X once more dances to one of his softly sung songs. Then one of the marshals calls out to open the door and the guests disperse, except the novices who sleep in X's house.

[The Beheading Dance]

*575 *796 532 tells them that he wants a mask made to represent his own face. The purpose for which it is destined is not mentioned, although there is no reason why the workmen, all of them kukusiut, should not know, as they actually do. X blackens his face a trifle, making it easier to depict, and lies down as model for the carpenters, who at once start chiselling masks. Each works independently, and usually finishes one, or even two or three, in a day. Five or six carpenters are labouring simultaneously, and when the first group of masks has been finished the marshals, and perhaps one or more influential chiefs as well, come to inspect the handicraft. The masks are laid out in a glade of the forest and the marshals make their criticisms.

"No. The nose is too long," they say of one mask, or,

"The cheeks are too full," with regard to another.

It is seldom that one of the first group of completed masks meets with their approval, but the next morning the carpenters try once more, with X again lying down as model. In the evening the marshals again examine the results. Hundreds (probably an exaggeration) are often made before one is found which satisfies every requirement, and if the carpenters fail to produce a realistic portrait, the rite cannot be carried out. The unsuccessful attempts are carefully hidden in the forest lest they should be seen by an uninitiated person. When Owiewalcus performed the rite, it was near the end of September before one of the carpenters succeeded in making a satisfactory model.

When the wooden representation has been completed, there is no further doubt about holding the ceremony, and one of the marshals, acting for X, summons the singers and other influential kukusiut to the secret meeting place for a discussion of preliminaries.* At this conference X tells the carpenters what he proposes to give them as presents for the work they have done for him; the concept of "pay" is entirely lacking although it is an essential part of the transaction. The singers are told thus been slain about seventy years earlier. It appears that attempts were commonly made to kill chiefs by means of sympathetic magic, and it is quite possible that such attempts, becoming known, preyed upon the minds of the victims to such an extent that death resulted. 578 622 682 [754]

WEALTH

Since wealth is so important in chieftainship, it would be desirable at this point to consider the concepts of wealth. Unfortunately, it is impossible to give a satisfactory treatment of this subject. The coming of the white man altered the economic aspects of Bella Coola life so radically, and at such an early period, that concrete examples of economic interdependence, so useful in a thorough study, could not be obtained in the field. It is possible that greater attention to this subject might have produced more satisfactory results, but I am doubtful of this. 114 177 556*

In the old days, "wealth" was of two categories: (a) Prerogatives, tangible or intangible, which could be shown, pictorially or dramatically, or could be expounded in words; and (b) Goods which could be distributed for validating such prerogatives. Individual possessions, unsuited for distribution, were hardly considered as wealth; a sewing-machine, a bottle of whiskey, a bed, or some other luxury might give satisfaction to the owner, but did not increase his importance in the eyes of his fellows. The value of objects was only for their use in ceremonial distribution; indeed, prior to such distribution, they were only of potential value. This attitude controlled Bella Coola economics in the early days of contact, and still influences their behaviour. A native store-keeper once ruefully commented on the fact that he would gain no advantage from the goods on his shelves, since he hoped merely to sell them, not to give them away. 556* [722] [177]

A man's relatives were expected to help him in the acquisition of goods, but the extent of their contributions was never 184 476 556*

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

184 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there
476 was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity 556 of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Nuaxt Society

551 The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position
556 of eminence are usually embodied in myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been 575 stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions
614 record other designations as well, each of which carries with it [595] the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as nuaxt. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as nuaxt names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men 556 and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way 575 a number of times, acquiring a new nuaxt name on each occa-
[562] sion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a nuaxt name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Coola say that the return of the dead "washes away grief," 556* 769 and unquestionably it has a comforting effect on the mind of the donor of the potlatch.

(3) Wealth. Unless a man has the necessary goods with 476● which to make presents he cannot invite guests, no matter how 556* important may be his ancestral myths and names. Some of 602 this wealth he may be able to amass by his own labours, but unless he is assisted by his wife's family it is virtually impossible for him to succeed. The Bella Coola believe that a man [583] cannot become a chief except through large payments made [622] by a woman's family when they "rebuy" her from her husband. In other words, no man can succeed without the support of his wife. In choosing a mate a man is guided almost entirely by [581] the ability of her family to give him financial support. In some cases an elderly couple assist a married son to give a potlatch; this custom, though considered quite proper, is not common.

(4) Supernatural assistance. To the Bella Coola this is 556* quite as important as the preceding. One man may work very 787 hard but his efforts are never crowned with success, whereas another man will prosper in every venture. This is due to the supernatural attributes given by the supreme god to the latter. By prayer, ceremonial chastity, and other means, a man may increase the powers granted to him, but if these are entirely lacking, he can never hope to rise to the position of chief.

PRELIMINARIES

In describing the potlatch, it will be convenient to refer to 556*
the donor as X, and assume him to be a middle-aged member of the nuxalk society, whose seat and name, though duly ratified, lack importance through his previous failure to give large presents.

For a number of years X has prospered. He has amassed quantities of skins, blankets, tools, copper ornaments, clothing, canoes, baskets, dentalium shell, slaves, and other valuables.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly [577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a 576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do other-574 wise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of [177] the family should be the first to taste any wine" as proof that [273] it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better
[342] than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse [414] through the construction of individual family houses with doors and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suit-476 able place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon, [226] the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a [685] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy;
[626] hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried [224] to excess. A hunter who brings back several mountain goats or other large game is expected to invite his neighbours to a feast, which virtually means that he must share his takings.

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who 431 has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as

*This is a modern practice, dating from the introduction of home-brew.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

855 rebuked. They grow up in the open environment of the [861] houses, absorbing more of their lore by watching and imitating than by actual instruction. Their care devolves chiefly [854] on the mother, although at any ceremony the father will be seen arriving with the baby in his arms, while his wife leads another child. Nurses are unknown and the parents take their children with them on all occasions; if it is necessary for a mother to be absent on some arduous toil, her child will be entrusted to a grandmother or other elderly relative.
606 There are no avoidances between the young people and their parents-in-law.

602 The obligation of present-giving does not stop with the 431 marriage ceremony. Whenever X gives a kusiut dance or other ceremony, Y's relatives are expected to contribute. It is felt that the weight of the presents given them during the period of engagement and at the wedding has become too heavy, and they throw this off by lavish giving. No count is kept of the value of gifts bestowed or received, though it is known that the family of the woman loses financially in the end. The father of many daughters is regarded as an unfortunate individual, who is always poor and overworked through the necessity of [554] providing for them. By so doing, however, he increases his own prestige, and the Bella Coola have the happy sentiment that such a man manages to get along some way; perhaps necessity rouses his ambition. Likewise X's relatives contribute to any ritual carried out by Y's father. If, for example, one of his wife's relatives dies, X and his friends may wish to contribute towards the funeral expenses. In fact, any ceremonial serves as an excuse for relatives by marriage to donate [556] goods and thus demonstrate publicly their influence, importance, and generosity.

602 The concept of mutual help between families who have intermarried is one that lasts for generations. In 1922 there 476 was in Bella Coola an old Kimsquit man who had left home some forty years earlier and had since lived in Smith Inlet where he married and had a boy. On the death of his wife, this

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)948
NES Bellacoola NES

old man came back to Bella Coola with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Bella Coola language. 602 476

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show this not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secret lore such as a special number of nights for ceremonial chastity. Conversely, if Y should not be a hamat, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of that society. The woman's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections; so she is initiated, using a name and prerogative embodied in her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names at any convenient ceremony later than the wedding. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die childless the names return to X's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that nawit names can never be transferred in this manner. 606 491 425 [715] [575] [553] [575]

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her personal comfort. If X beats or otherwise abuses her, they expostulate; and if his cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter when she runs away from her husband. If X should murder Y, she would be revenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer avoided his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is assumed that a husband may sell his wife as a 593 [602] [627] [567] 432 [48]

MECHANICAL PROCESSES

No attempt was made to study either the material culture of the Bella Coola, or their methods of manufacturing, but information on some points was obtained incidentally. All sociological and religious features connected therewith have already been described.

THE TAKING AND PREPARATION OF OLACHEN

The run of eulachon, smelt, comes about the end of April, and as many as possible are caught. In preparation, nets, ale'a', are brought out from the house where they have been stored during the winter, examined and repaired. If necessary, new ones must be manufactured out of nettle (lowa) fibre laid away by the women for this purpose. By rolling the material on their legs, they produce a fine twine; two strands of this are then interwoven, making a finished cord capable of resisting great strain. The nets are constructed by the men. The type used at the present time, which is said not to differ from that formerly employed, consists of a purse-like sack, oval in cross-section, open at the wider end and tapering very gradually to the other, which is closed. The usual length is about thirty feet, the diameter at the open end about eight feet, and at the closed end about three feet. A new net is dipped in a mixture of boiled hemlock-bark to darken it, and then boiled in a solution of willow-bark to prevent the knots from slipping.

The setting out of a net is not an easy task, as two or three men agree to work as partners. In the present depletion days, property rights are not respected and each group selects a suitable spot. The best location is where the water is about three feet deep and runs rapidly, but without ripples, over a smooth piece of the bottom; such a place is called a ckiya. When the fish begin to run plentifully, the partners paddle out to set their net, taking with them four stakes, each about ten feet in length. The weight of a full net is tremendous, as the poles have to be driven down at least six feet, a difficult task on account of the stony bottom. Selecting the exact spot, one of four posts, ellqiyiks, is set upright and held in position by being tied to a cross-piece, ma'qiyen, fastened to the canoe for the purpose. While his two partners hold the stake steadily, the third man begins to pound down the stake; metal mauls are now commonly used, but in former times this work was always done with an unhewed stone maul, lemenis. The fisherman relays one another conveniently until the top of the pole has been driven down to within [illegible] knives, metal and oil cans are found convenient for this purpose and have almost replaced wooden boxes. After repeated storings and discharings, all that remains is a mass of putrid fish, bearing no resemblance whatever to the fish from which it came. The Kitlahs are said to compress this into cakes for eating, but the Bella Coola throw it away. Some cooks bail out the drage by hand, but many of the boxes have a bung-hole at the bottom which, when opened, allows the semi-liquid remains to flow out into a rough trough leading to the river. As soon as one batch of chicken has thus been disposed of, another is boiled and refined in the same way. The grease keeps indefinitely and is a useful article of barter with the Carrier as well as a staple of Bella Coola diet. Although the preparation removes much of its offensive odour, chicken grease has an unpleasant taste to the white man.

During the boiling, all other activities are suspended and the people spend practically all their time on the river bank. If the fish are allowed to rot too long, much of the grease is lost, so men, women, and children are pressed into service to make the most of the short period. The men rise at dawn to scan the fires on the bank, the women and children follow with food, and for several days the whole village camps, as if on a picnic, until an indescribably foul smell that almost echoes anyone passing within hundreds of yards. There are tasks for everyone; the fish must be carried from the pits to the furnaces, wood must be brought, the fires cooked, the bottles stirred, the grease carried away, the fireplaces repaired, food cooked, and a hundred other chores. It is a scene of great activity, carried on with good humour and merriment, for the Bella Coola realize that they are storing up benefits for the following winter. Even the drage seem to share the general excitement, and do not disdain to use the drage from the bottles, which, when emptied into the river, attract numerous crows and gulls, to the joy of small boys with hunting dreams.

BELLA COOLA CANOES

Although wood and transport by water is still as vital to the Bella Coola as it was in their fathers, the motor boat is fast replacing the canoe, and the science of manufacturing their own craft is being lost. In former times several types were constructed, but only one of them is still employed—the spoon canoe, ch-ha, used on rivers (see Plate 21). These vary from twenty to thirty feet in more in length, and are about four feet wide; they are without keels, and there is no difference between the bow and stern. Although one man can handle such a craft in smooth water, at least two are required for a journey of any length, and four in the usual case. The captain, who is either the best woodsman or the one most familiar with the route, stands in the stern, the second is stationed in

"I suppose you have been misbehaving with the lad," he continued. "That is the meaning of your anger."

"Yes," replied his wife. "What are you going to do about it?"

Tsaklilt said no more, nor did he show any resentment; instead he hospitably prepared a comfortable bed for the youth.

"Don't go to sleep," Elsemanim whispered to him. "If he gets a chance, Tsaklilt always kills my lovers, and unless you keep awake he will murder you. When he yawns, you do the same."

As darkness settled down Tsaklilt yawned noisily, saying:

"When I have been out on the mountains all day it makes me yawn, but I cannot go to sleep."

"It affects me the same way," answered the young man, as he too yawned noisily.

This continued for hours, whenever Tsaklilt yawned the youth imitated him, and neither went to sleep.

It was dawn before Tsaklilt fell asleep and began to snore. Elsemanim had warned the lad what to do if this happened, so he rose silently, took Tsaklilt's stick,* which was placed upright beside the sleeper, and pointed it at him. Tsaklilt died instantly, as this was the weapon with which he was wont to kill mountain goats by merely pointing.

Up to this time Tsaklilt had always slain his wife's lovers by causing the planks beneath the bed to turn over so that the occupant was precipitated down a chasm, at the bottom of which there was a pile of bones of those he had murdered in this way. It was because Elsemanim loved the lad that she not only saved him but showed him how to kill her husband.

The young man did not return to his home, but continued to live with Elsemanim, who made him immortal. He assumed the name and occupation of Tsaklilt and it is he who has been seen by fortunate hunters even within recent years. If the evil old Tsaklilt had not been destroyed there would still be many mountains, but his successor, himself now a hunter, is of a kindly disposition and often gives aid to mortals in their pursuit of game. The old people used to say that unless Tsaklilt helped a hunter he would be unable to kill mountain goats at all.

the packers were so near them. They were too due to arrive for several hours, so Simmondsen cooked the goat and had a plentiful meal ready for his followers. They asked whether he had had any luck, and he answered casually that his son had killed one, but when they expressed regret at his lack of fortune, Simmondsen pointed to the pile of dead goats, visible in the distance, and said: 534* 224

"Not when my son killed."

Never before had there been such a slaughter of goats at one time, and it was obvious that no time could be lost if the meat was to be smoked before winter. Fortunately, there was a large cave in the vicinity where they established their headquarters. The packers were divided into two parties; some brought in the carcasses, while others began a few smoke-drying, tended the drying meat, and boiled out the grease. It was a slow process and there was a heavy snowfall before it was finished. The snow drifted into the narrow valley to such a depth that it was impossible to think of leaving. The beleaguered hunters were well provided with food, melted snow gave them water, and the cave was sufficient shelter, so their confinement was more irksome than dangerous. Nor did it prove profitless. The smell of food attracted two marauding which were so confused that they were killed with sticks. All the hunters began to make coats which were provided them with enough skins to make several of the much-prized blankets. 534* [261] [237]

So the winter dragged away. The wife of one of the packers had a reputation for faithlessness and her husband's companions used to tease him by saying that his wife would have remarried before he got home. This made so his mates until he determined to try to reach the village in spite of the snow. He constructed a pair of snow-shoes and set out, carrying with him enough marten-skins for four blankets, packed in a sack made from the stomach of one of the goats. The journey was less difficult than he had feared, he camped for one night, and reached his own village soon after dusk of the next day. Looking through the doorway, he saw his father throwing food into the fire and realized that someone must have died. He called out cheerfully, but his parents, who had long since abandoned hope for his son's safety, could not believe that his voice was real, and was not convinced until he actually stood before him. The long-absent one asked for whom the food was being thrown on the fire, and his father replied: [481]

"For you. We thought you must be dead and have burnt almost all your personal possessions."

"That does not matter," replied the son. "We have plenty of meat, grease, and furs."

As they grow older the plainness of features is more pronounced, accompanied by increasing heaviness of body (see Plate vi). Many of the adults are corpulent and move with slow, awkward gait. As a rule the men have great strength and are capable of prolonged and arduous exertion, particularly in paddling; in fact, constant use of canoes may have developed this powerful, ungainly build. Few are good walkers or parkers; such, if they are found, usually belong to the lighter interior type. Among the grown people the face, though unbeautiful, often has a kindly expression, even becoming attractive in laughter or when a friendly grin spreads from ear to ear. With advancing age the prominent nose seems to grow larger, frequently becoming almost aquiline (see Plate vi). Many of the older people assert that this was even more common in former times. In time the face becomes lined with wrinkles and the body appears to shrink (see Plate vi). The teeth are in many cases worn down to the gums; this seems to cause no discomfort, though an old person cannot utter the glottal stops and other sounds with which the language abounds without entering a fine spray of saliva. They are absolutely unable to pronounce several of the Bella Coola words, while the constant spitting is a disagreeable feature of their conversation, particularly as an investigator entering, often vainly, to record sounds accurately. The deep wrinkles of old women give them a benign "grandmotherly" expression, which makes them more attractive in extreme age than in youth (see Plate vi). Senile decay is so frequent that the return to infancy is mind as well as in physical powers is regarded as normal.

Among the coastal tribes hair on the face is not uncommon, but in this characteristic the Bella Coola are pre-eminent. Nearly all the men have sparse moustaches, at least; many have a heavy growth, and several are full-bearded. That this was due to white mixture was assumed at first, but no evidence could be found to support this view. There are a number of half-breeds in the community but they are no more hirsute than the full-blooded Indians. Razors are now almost univerany unwitnessed from their path. The hahaiai also call hoip separately, a further deterrent to the inquisitive. Alder and birch trees are selected and the heroes start to work. When one a tree falls, one of the party calls out:

Ewe . . .

This meaningless ejaculation, spoken as if by X, has the virtue of causing the tree to fall gently. The logs are cut into sections and as many provided as will be needed, since it is contrary to hahaiai custom for more than one trip to be made for wood. Towards dusk the curtain rises, each carrying a burden by means of a tump-line across the forehead. The wood is laid softly on the floor, for it would be a great insult to throw it down roughly. Meanwhile heralds are summoning the hahaiai with a call of:

X has long since consulted his relatives on the one hand and the nuxalkmim on the other, concerning the number of masks to be used, and the beings to be portrayed. A mask of Ewilhaukum is prepared for every hahaiai dance, but with this exception there is no uniformity in the representations. A mask always shows his person, as well as any beings intimately connected with him. Thus X must have a mask of Nuhlymm, many of his passengers, and the supernatural being who met him at the mouth of the river. A pennon must be given to the carver of every mask, hence their actual number depends upon the expenditure X and his relatives are willing to make.

At dusk the hahaiai are summoned by the heralds. X is with the nuxalkmim behind the fire and he hands their advice as to the best carpenter for any special mask. When all have assembled X holds up one of the blocks of wood, calls on one of the hahaiai by name and says:

"For Nuhlymm," or whatever may be the figure required.

As the carpenter comes forward to take the billet the heralds call out:

"Pay attention to him," and as the carpenter takes the wood, X calls out at the top of his voice, ewe . . .

to discuss the event and lay plans for the future, but as it is now daylight they too soon retire to sleep. 575* 796*

The kwistum ceremony resembles a double kwiat rite since it comprises two sets of four days and nights. The one on which X's stomach was cut is considered to be kwistumem. Accordingly, the heralds call the kwiatat to X's house early on the afternoon following and the regular ritual of nacistalap takes place. Some of the younger men are at once sent to the forest for wood to be made into more masks but, with the love of drama typical of the kwiatat, it is assumed that X himself is too feeble to accompany them. Accordingly his power is transferred to a substitute by means of the frenzied beating of sticks and repeated cries of hoip. On the return of the wood collectors, who carry their burdens as usual on tump-lines and set them down carefully, this power is restored to X in the same manner. The work of making the masks is now allotted. For kwistum, and several other kwiat rites hereafter to be described, the dancer is entitled to show as many of the beings in the Bella Coola pantheon as he desires. Consequently if X is wealthy and wishes to have a spectacular sukwum, he orders many masks. Then the kwiatat practise a number of songs composed by the singers. One, or sometimes two, prepared for X is couched as if he himself were telling what he had seen in the upper regions. They describe Alpaxtaw, his messenger Opaldzi Alpaxtaw, and, especially Kulakkwaqlat, the supernatural being whose stomach is periodically cut in the land above. It is he who has entered X and impelled him to suffer the same mutilation from the effects of which Sulimala has restored him. X himself usually remains concealed behind the matting in the rear part of the house, but sometimes, if he wishes to practise what he will perform the next night, he comes forward for a rehearsal. He still pretends to be very ill, and instead of dancing in the usual violent manner, moves around the fire, supported by several assistants, while he feebly shakes his hands. The women drum, and the uninitiated in the other houses realize that more exciting events are impending. [482] [424] [552] [796] [797] about a foot of the surface. In the same slow manner a second stake is driven in, about ten feet from the first, and in such a position that the main force of the current would strike at right angles a line drawn between the two. Then two more stakes are placed in position, slightly below the first pair, and tamped together, as shown in the diagram (Figure 2). The posts are often driven before the main run of the fish, and the fixing of the net delayed until that time. It is fastened to the four stakes, with its open end, which faces upstream, forming a rough oval, ten feet wide, of which the lower side runs on the bottom and the upper is at the surface. The outer stakes hold the upper edge, the inner ones secure the lower hem. The slackers are slow swimming fish which work their way upstream with the rising tide, and, when it turns, drift back into the net. Once within the opening, they lack strength to drive forward against current and tide, and are forced into the closed bottom, floating downstream, in thousands, to the peak of the season, a net is often extended to its full dimensions with a solid mass of fish, throwing a tremendous strain on supports and much work ahead. During the day, the mouth is closed with a cross piece, sometimes, to prevent floating objects from drifting within and damaging it, and opened during the night or whenever bear the tide turns.

FIG. 2. Diagram showing position of the stakes supporting an eulachon net.

Early in the morning begins the landing of the fish. The partners paddle out to the bottom of their net and, with considerable exertion, lift it into the canoe. A cord is tied around the ballast mass, cutting off a section, and the end is opened so that the fish from it fall into the bottom of the craft. Another part is dealt with in the same manner, then a third, and so in succession until the gleaming slackers are piled so deeply that no more can be landed with safety. Sometimes two or three loads, each of many thousands, are taken from a single net. The partners slowly pole to shore where, at the present time, their wives and children wait to unload the canoe. The fish are packed into baskets, carried on the back with the aid of a tump-line, and taken to pits which have been prepared not to 50 feet from the beach. These are three or four feet deep, lined with planks, and with their bottoms covered with evergreen boughs. The slackers are emptied into these holes, which are covered with more planks when full. If more fish are landed than can be handled conveniently in this manner, they are laid on benches spread on the ground, and a low wall of planks built up around them. Although the main run lasts for only three or four days, the slackers are so numerous that each group of partners is able to fill several of these storage pits.

THE cuitsuy.

Before the smallpox epidemic, about 1862, there were towns on the fords and villages of Dean Channel between Kimsquit and Bella Bella. The inhabitants were called cuitsuy by the Bella Coola, and cuaty by the Bella Bella. Their settlements were at Elcho Harbour, Green River, Cascade Inlet, and at several uninhabited places. Their language is said to have differed slightly from that of the Bella Bella, but the people themselves mingled freely with both Kimsquit and Bella Bella, thus forming a connecting link between these tribes.

A list of cuitsuy towns was obtained from one old man, who claimed to be a descendant of the people. It was impossible to verify this information, and since he himself was not an ideal informant, the following can be regarded only as approximately correct.

(1) Elhc: at Elcho Harbour.

(2) Ulcle: on a ford one mile above the last-named.

(3) Ilhit or Tuptsu: on a river three miles above the preceding.

(4) Tsemsid: on a river two miles above the preceding.

(5) Tsequil: on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(6) Uselhm: on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(7) Dawnik: on a river two miles above the last-named and thirty miles below Kimsquit.

According to the old man from whom the above list was obtained, Dawnik, at Kimsquit, recorded earlier as village no. 41, was also populated by cuitsuy people. There was so much intermarriage between the two groups that it is now impossible to ascertain whether the inhabitants not only of Dawnik, but of Tsemsid as well, were predominantly Kimsquit or cuitsuy.

The open plateau in which the Bella Coola River rises has always made travel possible for long distances, so that not only the neighbouring Carriers, but Chilkotin as well sometimes descended to the valley. On the coast, though the dense underbrush prevented travel along the shore, the long fiords, sheltered from the open Pacific, were ideal for the use of canoes.* Comparatively lengthy journeys were neither difficult nor uncommon. The Tsi'is people were usually on amicable terms with the inhabitants of Rivers Inlet, and the Kimsquit with the Kitlope. The Bella Coola were accustomed to attend potlatches at Alert Bay and Fort Rupert,* Knight's Inlet, and Bute Inlet, receiving their hosts, in turn, at Bella Coola. On the other hand, there was little friendly intercourse with the northern tribes, of which the Kitkatla especially were dreaded by the residents of the central coast. Until recent years the Bella Coola had no direct knowledge of other Salish-speaking peoples, although some of the Chilkotin told them of a tribe living far to the south, in the interior, whom they encountered in some of their wanderings and used to term Nuxálkuy, recognizing the similarity between their language and that of the Bella Coola. A few years ago several Bella Coola attended a boarding-school and were amazed to find that many of their words were understood by fellow-students from Chilliwack.

To sum up: The Bella Coola were in close contact with the neighbouring coastal tribes, with the members of which they felt themselves to have cultural affinities. They recognize that they have received many ceremonial rites from their neighbours, and must have adopted other elements of culture which they now consider indigenous. It is probable that certain Bella Coola customs must likewise have been transmitted to other tribes, but such lie without the scope of this monograph. The outlying villages were in close contact with foreign neighbours, and tended to assimilate elements of their culture, but, on the whole, the Bella Coola present a tribal unity with distinctive local customs, falling within the general pattern of coastal culture.

easy for Tsaiawaw to gain control over them, and the sleeper wakes to find that he has been bleeding profusely and death is inevitable. This occurred to a man whose experiences are described in vol. I, chap. IX.

Although Tsaiawaw is usually a curse to mortals, he can also do good. Occasionally he makes a man a shaman, and in many cases he helps a woman in childbirth. Such beneficent acts are not sufficient to counterbalance his evil deeds, and he remains one of the most dreaded of Bella Coola supernatural beings, a monster whose machinations make camping in a strange place a dangerous undertaking, and who is as likely to strike down rich or poor, young or old.

Less feared than Tsaiawaw, because he appears less frequently, is Alilt-tsiall. The Bella Coola speak of this being with trepidation, but little definite information could be obtained concerning him. He has human form and sometimes comes at dusk to cause death by carrying away a man's spirit.* The home of this creature appears to be beneath the earth rather than in Nuxwáit-a.

A third dreaded being who, like the two preceding, usually lives on this earth and only visits in Nuxwáit-a, is Sá-ówa, "The Death Dealer." He, too, appears in human form and can be distinguished by the nose-ring which he always wears. Sudden death in the forest is always attributed to "The Death Dealer." If a man is engulfed by a slide, or killed by a falling tree, it is because this malevolent being has entered the slide or tree. Some Bella Coola say that he is responsible for animals who kill hunters. He rarely carries out his designs with the aid of sickness, nor is death by drowning often attributed to him, but for all other fatal disasters he must take the blame. While a corpse is resting in a coffin awaiting burial, Sá-ówa invariably sits on the cover, though none can see him. Instances are known in which even this monster has acted in a kindly manner.

The supernatural beings thus far described are usually place where he is not likely to be disturbed, and addresses the supreme god in a loud tone of voice, requesting his assistance. 782

Although prayers can be said at any time of the day, or at any season of the year, there are occasions when they are more potent than at other times. At dawn, for example, a wise young man is accustomed to go alone to the river to wash and pray. He enters the icy water, blows mucus over his hands, and rubs his body vigorously* either with a smooth pebble, or, if it can be obtained, with a stone taken from the stomach of a sea-lion. As he scours himself, he asks Mesakeiz to grant him long life, power, success, and strength. On coming from the water, he repeats his request, and then washes himself again. This process is repeated four times, making eight prayers in all. A young man who does this habitually, and in other ways placates the supreme deity, is likely to have success, and may even be given supernatural assistance by one of the many anthropomorphic or zoomorphic creatures. The underlying belief is that Alquntim actually hears the words spoken and, pleased thereby, aids the petitioner either directly, or by strengthening the supernatural elements in his body. [783]

Mesakeiz has power over both rain and dry weather, and is petitioned for whichever is desired. When the sun is obscured by rain clouds, the Bella Coola pray: [821]

"Please clean your face, Mesakeiz," or,

"Please show us your face, we need you."

Before a man starts on a journey, either by canoe or on foot, he always asks help for his undertaking. [484]

"Mesakeiz," he prays, "Be with me," or "Go before me," or, "Give me what I want."

Corresponding to the importance of the occasion, prayers are always made before the departure of a hunting or war [824] [825] [585]

*Urine was formerly used for washing both the body and clothing. It was followed by the application of clean water, and undoubtedly had a religious significance; indeed, washing purely for cleanliness was not habitual until recently. [515]

the point between Labouchere Channel and Bentinck Arm, there is danger from treacherous currents, so, when a shaman passes either of these places, he lays some food on the water and puffs eagle down into the air as he asks for help. If no shaman is in the canoe, this is done by the captain. 782 [193] [502] [756]

The being to whom offerings are most commonly made is Tlitsèpilète-a, the supernatural woman who cures the sick and gives power to shamans. Whenever a hunter kills an edible animal in the forest, he cuts off four pieces of flesh and throws them into his fire to gain her goodwill. Long, long ago, Tlitsèpilète-a appeared to a hunter, seized some of his quarry, and told him of her wishes with regard to presents; these have since been obeyed by wise people. Similarly, the relatives of a man absent in the mountains or at sea throw scraps of food on the fire and ask the protection of Tlitsèpilète-a for the one in danger. In this case, it is clear that objects thrown into flames are received and appreciated by Tlitsèpilète-a. [776] [224] [779]

Mesakais, although usually propitiated by prayer, is also given presents. Frequently, when a man is praying, he accompanies his words by blowing up into the air small particles of eagle down. Prayers in connection with the departure of war or hunting expeditions have already been mentioned, but before starting on any journey by canoe, the captain is careful to pray and to throw upon the water four pieces of red, and four of yellow cedar-bark. The blowing upwards of eagle down is a common accompaniment to all kinds of prayers, but, if none is available, cedar-bark can be used equally satisfactorily. If possible, this is cast on the surface of water, otherwise into a fire, as a request is being made. The Bella Coola do not believe that such presents are actually used and considered valuable by Mesakais, but they emphasize and accompany the vocal prayer, and demonstrate the petitioner's sincerity. [776] [484] [824] [825]

Ghosts, on the other hand, depend almost entirely on presents given them by mortals, since food is not abundant in the land below. The relatives of a dead person always throw 775 782

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar droning cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food. 535 556* 575 [424]

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the sisaok society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are secluded a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is secluded, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so easy of late years to give potlatches that the simpler rite has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shorter ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests. [554]

DELIVERING OF INVITATIONS

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch; it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to summon those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that each guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents. 556* [203] [558]

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [203] [424]

203 that he wants so-and-so, giving the name of a chief, to go, for
* 556 instance, to Bella Bella, to invite a certain person, whose name 484 he gives, to the potlatch. X likewise names those whom he [575] wishes to form the escort. As a sisook whistle is used, it is essential either that the chief himself be a senior sisook, or that a siki go with him. It is immaterial whether or not all of the crew are members of the society. Nobody is compelled to go, but as all know it will be a matter of pride to X to recompense them, none declines except for some strong reason. X names those whom he wishes to proceed to other tribes, sending one canoe to each group of towns. He arranges their departure according to the distance each must travel, the aim being to have all the guests arrive at Bella Coola at the same time. X is expected to provide food for his guests as soon as they arrive, and as the potlatch cannot start until all have assembled, X tries to ensure simultaneous arrival, no easy matter [648] since the area from which guests are invited extends from the Nass River to Alert Bay.

The mysterious and sacred nature of the potlatch is impressed on the minds of the uninitiated at the time of departure. When the chief who is to bear the invitation, and the members of the crew are ready in the canoe at the beach, there is heard from X's house the sound of a whistle. The uninitiated, unaware of the method by which the noise is produced, consider it to be the voice of some supernatural being connected with the potlatch. Either the messenger himself, or some assistant with him, blows a whistle. This can be done without exposing the method by putting the whistle to the lips under cover of a large blanket. When this has sounded the canoe is free to proceed.

The messenger-chief carries with him his sisook mask, which he dons if he sees another canoe approaching, while [532] eagle down is scattered over the heads of the paddlers. These two signs intimate that the occupants of the craft are on ceremonial business, therefore must not be molested. For a con-
[726] siderable distance up and down the coast the sacred nature of the potlatch is recognised to such an extent that an attack upon envoys is unthinkable, though one or two myths recount how this unwritten law was violated on rare occasions. A canoe meeting potlatch messengers veers over to the other side of the channel to give them the right of way.

On reaching the destination the canoe is brought to close to shore until the inhabitants of the village have gathered on the beach, which they swiftly do on the arrival of strangers. The messenger sounds his whistle, the significance of which is fully understood by members of the nusak society. Any chief who wishes to show his wealth and importance will invite them to his house. As they are landing, he sends a herald to summon a number of influential people of his village, who seat themselves in their rightful places. As the messengers enter they are given seats on the bench behind the fire, the spot usually reserved for chiefs. A number of lads are called in to toast smoked salmon, and when this has been done the fish are broken into shreds by young girls and served to the messengers on a mat, in lieu of a table-cloth. The envoys do not deliver their message as soon as they arrive. On the contrary, they spend the rest of the day aimlessly talking with their hosts, and sleep in the house where they have been received.

The following day likewise passes without ceremony, but towards nightfall the host summons all his fellow-villagers to his house. The singers take up their customary places and beat out a kusiut tune. Upon hearing his or her air, the owner of it starts to dance. Using their own discretion, the singers beat out the tunes of kusiut after kusiut, and each dances. In like fashion the singers beat out nusak songs, and the owner of each dances. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the dances are merely of a ceremonial, not a sacred, nature. When all have danced, each gives a present to the envoys. These gifts are not returnable. They are merely "eagle down," but it is necessary that something be given to validate the dances. The value is immaterial, so far as the purpose is concerned, though a chief who wishes to exhibit his chief-like he can. Several of the older people mentioned that early white traders would have received more for their goods by giving them away than by selling. 556 431

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to sisaok, a'alk, or even kusiut. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small. 556 431 [414]

[334] [424] [536] to commemorate the killing of the eagle. The rest of his song described how he had come to this earth and how he had shot the bird which had been his own chief. This dance was duly validated by presents of salmon, and has since been carried out by the descendants of Imanse. It is assumed that the concept of such a dance was given to him by Sqaxoxtin before he left Nuxalk-a, but he said his own discoveries on this earth as to the actual cause for it.

At this gathering of people, virtually a potlatch, Imanse took for himself the name Sxuqilaiaxs, "What Fills People." He chose this name with reference to the countless salmon caught in his weir.

Imanse next travelled to Bella Bella seeking a wife. His fame and wealth were so well known that he was able to wed Tlitsamit, the daughter of a powerful chief. She had the valued prerogative of wailing, a right which had been duly validated by presents. Her father told her that when she was going with Imanse to Kimsquit she would pass Tsyaolengi, a man who had been turned to stone on the skyline above the western side of Dean Channel, about five miles from its head, and that unless she wailed as she passed him her children would be unable to enjoy this prerogative. The reason for this injunction is not now understood; it is merely recognized that as Tsyaolengi became petrified near Imanse's home he became, in some manner, a crest. As the canoe bearing Tlitsamit passed Tsyaolengi she began to wail and weep, nor could her husband soothe her. He, for his part, told the herald, Nuxiliag, who had come with him from above, to call out as follows:

"Hello! Crest, our chief has married a Bella Bella woman; so you are his crest, so are you here."

[484] [765] When Nuxiliag had called this a second time the stone man answered. Ever since, passers-by have addressed Tsyaolengi, and a failure on his part to reply is considered an omen of death.

Tlitsamit brought her husband several valuable prerogatives, a crest dance with the large cone-shaped whistles, several hamat dance rights, as well as some dyed cedar-bark. According to one of Imanse's descendants, this is how the xaxat ritual reached Kimsquit. Among the Bella Bella, whales can only be eaten by chiefs, and Imanse received this right from his father-in-law. The latter also gave his son-in-law a dead whale, which was towed behind the canoe towards Kimsquit. Imanse knew that his people would object to it being brought into the river, since there was a firm belief that a whale would drive away the salmon. Accordingly, he beached the carcass in the fiord and there dried the meat in smoke.

Imanse now determined to give an elaborate potlatch at which he planned to portray his prerogative with regard to the whale. He decided to build his new house of the semi-subterranean type; when it was finished place in the manner already described. After passing through the fourth hole, or for the fourth time through the single opening, the two go to some lonely pool in the forest where the mourner washes. They light a fire and deposit on it some of his clothing, placing the rest in a stump or hollow tree. The friend always takes with him a supply of new clothing which the person being purified puts on and returns home, cleansed from the immediate taint of death.

The above rite presents widower or widow, but does not alter the fact that for one year they are ceremonially "unclean" and must obey sundry taboos. They must not go to the beach of the river, or even appear at the front door of a house facing it. To do so is displeasing to the salmon; for the same reason they cannot eat this fish unless it has been smoked. If they wish to travel on the ocean, they cannot embark at the village but must go through the woods to a point on the shore and there be picked up by the canoe. There is a regular "Widows and Widowers Rock" about a mile on either side of every village on the ocean. The one near Kincaple is called Sphen'k, and there is thought to be blood on it. A person mourning a consort must wear a hat decorated with miniature coppers of which the bottoms are bent upwards; should this be omitted, when the offender remarries, the new husband or wife will soon die.

In addition to these taboos, there are customary laws of behaviour, an infraction of which renders the offender liable to social disapproval. Widows and widowers should cut their hair short, and the former should rub ashes on the face. Sexual intercourse is prohibited to both sexes; if this rule is broken, the relatives of the deceased are insulted. Remarriage should not take place for at least a year, although among poor people it sometimes occurs after only six months, in which case all taboos and restrictions automatically cease. There is no law on this point, but it is considered fitting to allow this period to elapse. These requirements clearly indicate that bereavement is not merely an individual affair, but entails social and them receive it more likely that they will grant his requests. Therefore, a shaman is usually called upon to perform the following rites: 756* 782

(1) Washing the mouth of a person who has died without uniting from his body the first salmon or eulachon of the season (I, p. 456). [764]

(2) Asking assistance for the complicated rites of the potlatch (I, p. 191). [556]

(3) Request for assistance before starting on a journey, by pulling eagle down into the air (I, p. 108). [984]

(4) Request for aid by means of placing food on the water and blowing eagle down into the air to Thunderbird Nose and Kwanna (I, p. 104).

In fact a supplication to any supernatural being can be made with greater prospect of success by a shaman than by any other person.

The Power of Shamans

As has been said, a shaman actually has power within himself, and this is so strong that it may be a source of danger to others. If a man should pass behind one so endowed when the latter is eating, his spirit would be drawn from his body into the shaman's mouth, which would close with a click, crushing the spirit and killing the man. This is quite involuntary on the part of the shaman. It happened more than once among the early inhabitants, and since that time people have been very careful not to pass behind an eating shaman; this taboo was still in force until about 1885. A shaman, too, is said to be able to recall a spirit which has left its body, and thus caused illness. It is believed by some that shamans can see the position of a person's tally post, and so judge the length of his life. These examples show the varying beliefs of different Bella Coola concerning the powers of shamans. 756* [761] [264] [178] [755]

But the force within the shaman is really more dangerous to its possessor than to others. As certain "unclean" objects are able to subdue supernatural beings, so do these same ob- 756* 783 841

WAR WITH THE CARRIERS

B C 648 721 The only other people with whom the Bella Coola came into frequent conflict were the Carriers. Some of the latter used to spend the winter among the coastal tribes, and had even intermarried with them to a considerable extent, but their mode of life was so different that they were always viewed as foreign in thought and outlook. The Bella Coola despised them for B [184] their dirtiness, their fondness for unsavoury food, and, above all, for their ignorance of dsaiat and nuxoi matters. This distrust was mutual and not infrequently led to bloodshed. Owing to the location of the Carriers, they could not be reached by B [484] canoes, and the Bella Coola had no liking for long overland journeys. The mobility and relative lack of permanent villages made it difficult to bring the Carriers to bay, so that warfare between them and the Bella Coola usually took the form of a killing followed by a raid for revenge; continued hostility was virtually unknown. The people of the lower villages were scarcely affected, but in former times there seems to have been a considerable amount of intermittent fighting between the inhabitants of the upper valley and the Carriers living east of them.

B C 648 726 The following account, claimed to be historical, describes what was said to be a typical raid, followed by a counter-attack.

On one occasion all the young people of Sisaal, Nuxalk, Axda da-i, and Swaisli went on a picnic to a large, clear tract of ground up the valley, where they spent their time, playing and singing. Towards nightfall two young men, who had not come with the others, drew near cautiously until they could call a girl who was a friend of one of the two. She slipped off quietly from her companions and passed the night with her lover and his comrade in the woods. Towards dawn a party of marauding Carrier Indians swooped down on the sleeping picnickers who, unarmed and unprepared, could make no resistance. With the exception of two pretty girls carried off as slaves, all were slain. The three who had been in the woods hurried back to the villages with the news.

The men of the four towns prepared for action. They went to the picnic ground and brought back the corpses for burial, thus learning for

WARFARE*

General Observations — Specific Accounts

General Observations

721 698 PRIOR to the establishment of British rule, there was considerable warfare among the coastal tribes of British Columbia. Long-continued struggles leading to the extermination of one or other of the participants were unknown, but there were common raids, counter-raids, forays, and attacks. These were never as continuous as on the Plains, where martial achievements were regarded more highly than on the coast, but it appears probable that at least several villages of the Bella Coola were embroiled every few years. Nevertheless, [794] war was secondary in importance to ceremonial rites. During the winter, peace reigned and members of hostile tribes were [354] even received as guests at some dances. At potlatches they might be subjected to insult, later to be avenged in the same manner or by active hostility, but seldom was actual violence offered either to envoys or guests. The symbol of peace and 726 friendliness was eagle down; the occupants of a canoe who 825 bore an invitation to a potlatch, or who were guests them- 778 selves, used to blow this substance up into the air whenever 484 another craft approached, and it was incumbent on the latter [578] to veer over to the other side of the channel. Eagle down was [627] considered to be so sacred that when two men were quarrelling a chief could stop them by blowing some of it over their heads. 721 In winter, hostilities were prevented by ceremonies, and in summer the people were usually busy laying in supplies of food; consequently, it was only in the late spring that fighting was [575] at all common. Even then the dictates of ceremonial life were [622] not entirely forgotten; no hatsat novice went to war and

*Warfare having long been discontinued, the past tense is used throughout this chapter.

861 (31) Kadis, "Ocean Fish-Trap": on the east side of South Bentinck Arm, about a quarter of a mile from the Nuxk' River. [224] It is doubtful whether this was a town, or merely a camping place of the people of Nuxk' when using their salmon-trap.

*(32) Nuxk': on a raised mound at the south side of the mouth of the Nuxk' River, which enters the head of South [731] Bentinck Arm from the east. The meaning is unknown. This [164] was a populous town until the inhabitants were decimated by an epidemic of smallpox.

*(33) Tilsis: on the west side of the mouth of the river of the same name which flows into South Bentinck Arm from the south. The location of this village was constantly changed, [133] owing to destructive variations in the course of the river. It was formerly a large town, and has been deserted only since 1900. This village had another name, Tywaxlis, "Facing," so called because its houses faced those of the town of Nuxk'.

(35) Xwepa: on the east side of the mouth of a creek flowing into the bay at the head of South Bentinck Arm, from the south. This town was of moderate size. The meaning of the name is unknown. It is thought to be in the Rivers Inlet language.

VILLAGES AT KIMSQUIT

[133] Two rivers, the Dean from the east, and the Kimsquit from the north, flow into the head of Dean Channel, and the villages of this area can be grouped according to the two rivers.

Villages near the Dean River 361

*(36) Awaldo: the present site of the Kimsquit Indian village near the mouth of Dean River. The meaning of the name could not be learnt.

*(37) Nadel, "Canyon": on the shore of Dean River at the bottom of the canyon. This large town was only recently deserted.

(38) Ayai, "Occupied Mound": on the south side of Dean River about one mile from the sea. This small town was deserted many years ago. The name is derived from the small mound on which it was built.

*(39) Natqmak, "Many Spawning Sockeye Salmon": on south side of Dean River, about one and a quarter miles from the sea. A large town recently deserted.

*(40) Nazqlqo, "Place of Many Spring Salmon": on south bank about twenty-five miles from the sea. This spot was not settled when people first occupied this world, but later Alqwa-sim (I, p. 330) took possession of it. [173]

(41) Iyumk: east side of river twenty-eight miles from the sea. There is doubt about this town. It is said to have been a colony of the Kimsquit River settlement, a statement difficult to understand.

(42) Siwal-ai, "Where Canoes Are Left": on the north side of the river about thirty-five miles from the sea. Immediately opposite was Saltalta, "Winter Trail." These two are considered as forming one town, but were probably never more than camping grounds at the spot where the winter trail to the interior left the river. It is possible, however, that they formed a town, since the names of the alleged first settlers in the beginning of time are preserved. [187] [173]

*(43) Asklta: at Salmon House on the upper Dean River.

The history of the villages on the upper Dean is puzzling. Mythological accounts of their founding were obtained, and some of the older people stated that they had been occupied until recent years. On the other hand, there are apparently 174 men, and the village constitutes a unit for all dances; in fact this ceremonial unity is its most important function.

With the exception of a few villages built on the seashore, each Bella Coola settlement consists of a row of houses on the river bank. These are of the usual rectangular, plank-built type typical of the North-West Coast. In front of them stretches a sidewalk, usually supported by piles on the side nearest the river to make it level. The houses, too, in many cases have piles beneath their front ends, made necessary by the steep slope of the bank. In large villages there may be two rows of houses, behind and above one another. Usually there is a rough path parallel to the row of houses at the very ledge of the river. The number of houses varies; before the smallpox epidemic some villages contained as many as thirty or forty, others, only two or three. There is no definite arrangement of the houses; anyone may build where there is a vacant space. Much the same arrangement occurs in the sea-coast villages, each of which depends for its main sustenance on an ocean fish-trap, as the river villages depend on a salmon-weir.

342 [354] The central part of each house is occupied by a large fire, often sunk a considerable distance below the level of the floor, and around this is an open space free to all. Toward the side-walls are raised the partitions, forming bedrooms for the different families, or for different members of one. In many cases the flooring is removed in three or four parts of the house for small fires on which different groups cook, the central fire being used for heating and for more important meals. The [572] [622] number of families occupying a house depends on its size; an important chief, with many relatives, often builds an enormous house which is occupied by ten or more families; smaller houses contain only two or three. Life in the larger houses is free and open; people are constantly passing in and out, and any-[261] one present when food is being distributed is given a share as a matter of course. Most of the houses are decorated with [353] carved upright posts and paintings on the beams and back-wall. [535] A door through the latter leads to the back-room, so important in dances.

Gmagal married a Bella Bella woman who brought with her the prerogative of a dance with respect to the dog-fish. In Bella Bella the rite was connected both with the feasts and the cannibal, but in Kitamaat it was performed only as a feast dance. It was first given there by Laigaam-i, a relative of Gmagal, and has since been performed in the Indian in Kitamaat. Their daughter received the Bella Bella name, Yalem, which has since remained in Kitamaat.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Ăpai-i[*]

In the beginning of time there came to Ăpai-i, on the east side of the Dean River, about one mile from the sea, Sawamilks and his three younger brothers. They brought a cause hammer as their present from Ăpaaskim. After they had lived some time on this earth, Sawamilks asked Yaltimat to have a canoe ready for him on the morrow. By the next day Yaltimat had completed a fine craft. Sawamilks was delighted and spent four days fitting it out; then set out with his three younger brothers for a trip to the far north, where he knew by report that abalone-shells were to be found.[*] The four did not know the route and were consistently persevering into fords from which there was no exit; however, they persevered and were helped by all whom they encountered, Sawamilks's name being well known. After a month's voyage, they reached their goal. They found themselves before a lofty precipice falling sheer into the ocean with a cavern visible in it at very low tide. This they boldly entered. At first they were deluged with falling star-fish; in fact, their canoe would have been sunk by the weight of these if the youngest brother had not held up his cedar-bark cloak to ward them off. A little farther on they found countless abalone-shells, with which they swiftly filled the canoe, fearing lest the tide should rise sufficiently to prevent their return if they stayed to investigate further. Once safely outside they camped, and the eldest brother took the opportunity to bestow names on the younger brothers for things they had seen or done on the way. He called his second brother Nawaiw-dzag, "The Warrior," as if he had fought against the abalone; the third Ăla-ilmin, "Falling Star-Fish," and the youngest Ăkaqen, "The Roof-Maker," a reference to the

[*]The Bella Coola are emphatic in stating that abalone-shell comes from the north or the east; possibly this may be explained by an indirect trade route.

CHAPTER I

LOCATION AND ENVIRONMENT

Location—Bella Coola Villages—Tribal Organization—Neighbouring Tribes

Location

"BELLA COOLA" is the common designation of those Indians who, until a few years ago, inhabited the valley of the Bella Coola River in central British Columbia. Boas has recorded[1] that the name is a mis-pronunciation of Bilwula,[2] a Kwakiutl word of doubtful origin which white pioneers assumed to be the appellation of the people in question. There is no term in their own language to include the groups treated in this monograph. Linguistically, the Bella Coola form an isolated island of Salish-speaking people, separated from others of the same stock by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage.[3] Culturally, they belong to the central section of the North Pacific coast area.[4]

The Bella Coola River rises among the mountainous uplands of central British Columbia. Its two main branches fall rapidly, about forty-five miles from the sea, into two deep gorges which unite, some five miles farther on, to form the valley of the Bella Coola. Down this the river rushes in serpentine curves (see Plate 5). Too shallow and too rapid for the use of large boats, even if such had been known to the Bella Coola, it serves to bear their dug-out canoes, each hewn from some mighty cedar. The valley is never wider than two or three miles and is hemmed in by lofty snow-capped moun-

the neighbouring Carriers, but Chilkotin as well sometimes descended to the valley. On the coast, though the dense underbrush prevented travel along the shore, the long fiords, sheltered from the open Pacific, were ideal for the use of canoes.[10] Comparatively lengthy journeys were neither difficult nor uncommon. The Tal'ío people were usually on amicable terms with the inhabitants of Rivers Inlet, and the Kimsquit with the Kitlobe. The Bella Coola were accustomed to attend potlatches at Alert Bay and Fort Rupert,[11] Knight's Inlet, and Bute Inlet, receiving their hosts, in turn, at Bella Coola. On the other hand, there was little friendly intercourse with the northern tribes, of which the Kitkatla especially were dreaded by the residents of the central coast. Until recent years the Bella Coola had no direct knowledge of other Salish-speaking peoples, although some of the Chilkotin told them of a tribe living far to the south, in the interior, whom they encountered in some of their wanderings and used to term Nuxálkmq, recognizing the similarity between their language and that of the Bella Coola. A few years ago several Bella Coola attended a boarding-school and were amazed to find that many of their words were understood by fellow-students from Chilliwack.

To sum up: The Bella Coola were in close contact with the neighbouring coastal tribes, with the members of which they felt themselves to have cultural affinities. They recognize that they have received many ceremonial rites from their neighbours, and must have adopted other elements of culture which they now consider indigenous. It is probable that certain Bella Coola customs must likewise have been transmitted to other tribes, but such lie without the scope of this monograph. The outlying villages were in close contact with foreign neighbours, and tended to assimilate elements of their culture, but upon the whole, the Bella Coola present a tribal unity with distinctive local customs, falling within the general pattern of coastal culture.

The following is an account of a feud which took place about 1870: 556* 558 628

The people of Sneel had gone to a potlatch at Tăl-ła with a plentiful supply of goods, expecting to be insulted in revenge for a slight cast upon their host when visiting Sneel. They were allotted places close to the fire, upon which the donor cast a large quantity of olachen grease until the intense heat almost roasted his guests. Not one of them moved; to have done so would have meant an admission that they were being made uncomfortable by their host's demonstration of wealth by this waste of valuable food. Presently, Sneałłała, the leading chief of the visitors, stood up and called for "water" to douse the flames, meaning goods of equal or greater value, to indicate that he was as wealthy as his host and as little afraid of destroying valuables. His companions threw on the fire boxes filled with skins, but Sneałłała desired still further to demonstrate his prowess. Hastily, he asked some of the other Bella Coola present to lend him a sea canoe (of the large type called Haidał), promising to repay with two of the same kind. The Bella Coola agreed and the craft was carried in, the beavers showing their disregard for the host by breaking his door as they did so. The canoe was thrown on the fire and the flames smothered. Sneałłała called upon his Tăl-ła rival to douse that fire. The latter was afraid to do so, being aware that he had barely enough goods to pay his debts at the coming distribution. Accordingly, he tacitly acknowledged the superiority of Sneałłała, who thus rose in public esteem. [501]

It is very difficult to discover just how often such destruction of goods took place. The Bella Coola realize that the prevalence of this practice among the Kwakiutl led to the potlatch being forbidden by law, and are reticent on the subject. Reliable informants agree that it was a fairly common custom in the early days, although it never went to the extremes prevailing at Fort Rupert and Alert Bay, where, too, was common the breaking of coppers in anger, an act unknown in Bella Coola. In other respects, also, the potlatch among the Bella Coola appears to be less important and less complicated in ritual than among the Kwakiutl, so it is highly probable that the above statement is correct. 556* 558 171

Another method of shaming a guest is to serve him, or any member of his party, so clumsily or gracelessly with food that it is spattered over him. In some cases this happens acci- 558 556*

intense pain caused him to shriek in agony. Judging by the sound that the guards had been overcome and were being killed, the raiders were thrown into confusion. With one accord they abandoned the attack and fled to their canoes; those who first reached them pushed off at once, abandoning their less fortunate comrades to their fate.

One of Tsihoa's wives was a Bella Bella who feared that a dearly loved relative, a certain Nacmdi·a, might be among the assailants. In the confusion that followed the rout she called out in her native speech:

"Nacmdi·a, are you there?"

The Bella Coola had actually been reinforced by a number of Bella Bella volunteers including Nacmdi·a, but he had made good his escape. Another Bella Bella, less fortunate, realized that this was a chance for help and called back, imitating the voice of the man addressed. The woman was deceived and told him to drag one of the Kitkatla canoes into the water and that she would bring paddles as soon as she could do so unobserved. About forty of the attackers took possession of a large canoe, but their courage failed as they waited for the woman with paddles and they shoved off, propelling the craft with their hands. Aided by an off-shore wind, they were able to steal away from the scene and had almost reached a tiny inlet when they met another canoe coming to Tsihoa's assistance. A fight ensued, the refugees were driven ashore to the island and their canoe carried off. Even in their perilous position the party continued to wrangle. Some scoured the woods for yellow cedar from the bark of which the Carriers used to make canoes, an art well known, although not generally practised by the coastal tribes. Fire had swept over the island so that only two trees were found; the discoverers hastily peeled bark from these, fashioned it into rude canoes, and pushed off with their friends, leaving seven men marooned. The two craft ultimately reached Bella Coola after various adventures.

B/T [171] [50]

Among the seven abandoned were two uncles of the father of the man from whom this account was obtained, as well as the grandfather of a middle-aged Kimsquit man with whom the tale was also discussed. The two brothers were warriors, men whose bravery had been validated. One said to the other:

"You are always boasting of your valour, now is your opportunity to display it. Swim across and steal a canoe from the village we attacked."

Thus urged, the man agreed to make the attempt, first requesting the others not to kill his brother, the originator of the scheme, in case of his non-return, though this was the usual penalty for proposing a plan which led to the death of another. But the Bella Bella who had imitated Nacmdi·a's voice insisted on risking his life. He stripped, tied a knife to his hand, took a board for support, and essayed the theft. He had no

258 tacles; metal coal-oil cans are found convenient for this purpose and have [415] almost replaced watertight boxes. After repeated stirrings and skimmings, all that remains is a mass of putrid flesh, bearing no resemblance [171] whatever to the fish from which it came. The Kitlobe are said to compress this into cakes for eating, but the Bella Coola throw it away. Some [415] cooks bail out the dregs by hand, but many of the box-kettles have a bung-hole at the bottom which, when opened, allows the semi-liquid remains to flow out into a rough trough leading to the river. As soon as one batch of olachen has thus been disposed of, another is boiled and [439] refined in the same way. The grease keeps indefinitely and is a useful [262] article of barter with the Carriers as well as a staple of Bella Coola diet.
Although the preparation removes much of its offensive odour, olachen grease has an unpleasant taste to the white man.

258 During the boiling, all other activities are suspended and the people 476 spend practically all their time on the river bank. If the fish are allowed to rot too long, much of the grease is lost, so men, women, and children are pressed into service to make the most of the short period. The men rise at dawn to start the fires on the bank, the women and children follow with food, and for several days the whole village camps, as if on a picnic, amid an indescribably foul smell that almost sickens anyone passing within hundreds of yards. There are tasks for everyone; the fish must be carried from the pits to the furnaces, wood must be brought, the fires stoked, the kettles stirred, the grease carried away, the fireplaces repaired, food cooked, and a hundred other chores. It is a scene of great activity, carried on with good humour and merriment, for the Bella Coola realize that they are storing up luxuries for the following winter. Even the dogs seem to share the general excitement, and do not disdain to eat the dregs from the kettles, which, when emptied into the river, attract numerous trout and gulls, to the joy of small boys with hunting desires.

BELLA COOLA CANOES

● 501 Although travel and transport by water is still as vital to the Bella
[505] Coola as it was to their fathers, the motor-boat is fast replacing the canoe, and the science of manufacturing their own craft is being lost. In former times several types were constructed, but only one of these is still employed —the spoon canoe, sá-tla, used on rivers (see Plate 21). These vary from twenty to thirty feet or more in length, and are about four feet wide;
they are without keels, and there is no difference between the bow and stern. Although one man can handle such a craft in smooth water, at 502 least two are required for a journey of any length, and four is the usual crew. The captain, who is either the best waterman or the one most familiar with the route, stands in the stern, the second in command in

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the bow. The crew take their places at equal intervals between, each ready to work on the opposite side from the man in front. Each is provided with a ten-foot pole and also a paddle for use in spots where the river is too deep for poling. The rivers of central British Columbia are shallow, but swift, and their navigation requires considerable skill. Going upstream, the captain constantly seeks the smoothest water, where he knows the current will be least strong, and uses his pole to keep the craft headed in the right direction. Should it be caught in a violent eddy, he exerts his full strength, and it is his voice that rallies the crew for a final exertion to shove the canoe through. Coming downstream is more dangerous though less wearying. The water is so cold and the current so swift that a capsizing usually causes the drowning of one or more of the occupants, and the captain must never relax. Spoon canoes are very stable, and cannot be upset by a faulty distribution of weight. This is essential in view of the rapids, but they are heavy and cumbersome, unsuited to carrying large loads. 502 [501]

When a carpenter wishes to make a canoe, he fells a cedar of suitable size and trims off bark and branches to leave the central stem available. Slowly and laboriously he chips with his adze until he has hollowed out the trunk to the proper shape, and at the same time has smoothed away the outer surface. Sometimes a small fire is built on the trunk so that it will char the wood beneath and make it easier to remove, but the carpenter must be careful that the flames do not spread too far. Finally, as his work reaches completion, he becomes even more painstaking than before. The sides and bottom are whittled to a thickness of no more than three inches, and at this stage a faulty stroke may pierce the shell and ruin the toil of weeks. When completed, it is necessary to widen and harden the canoe. A fire is built beside it and stones thrown into the flames to heat; then lifted out and dropped into the water with which the craft has been partly filled. Steam rises, and the carpenter confines it by covering the canoe with matting, at the same time endeavouring to pull and force the sides apart. Sometimes he can do so by mere muscular effort, more often it is necessary to lay transverse thwarts within and, by pounding them downwards, extend the sides. No great extension is possible, nor is it required, but the steaming process is considered to harden the wood as well as widen the canoe. 396 [412]

Until five or ten years ago, the Bella Coola made another type of canoe, dpna, for use on the ocean. A few examples of this style are still in existence (see Plate 22). Though approximately the same length as river canoes, they are proportionately much deeper and narrower, and an extension downwards near the stern serves in place of a keel. These craft are sufficiently sea-worthy to weather any ordinary storm. Several 501

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

501 of the older people remember seeing in their youth another type, ikkan, with a high raised prow; this may have been identical with the mdka which others describe as having an elevated bow and a low stern. An entirely different craft was the tsmkwl-i, named from one of the geese, [825] probably the white-fronted goose. A strip of maple fastened along each side caught the water in moving, with a sound like that of the peculiar rustling flight of the bird. The bow was often carved in the form of a [532] bird's head and the stern in that of a tail to further the resemblance. No living Bella Coola claims to have seen one of these canoes, though some had heard of them from their grandparents. The large, open type of canoe made by the Haida was known to the Bella Coola, but not constructed by them. Sails were used on all ocean-going canoes; they were usually of matting, though skins sewn together were occasionally employed.

501 Canoes are occasionally lashed together. In several kusiut dances a 535 wide platform for dancing is required, and the need is met by lashing planks crosswise over two canoes, near the bow and stern, thus fastening them together. Planking is laid on the two supports and a platform so constructed. Careful inquiries showed that this fastening was merely a temporary arrangement; the bottoms were not bound in any particular manner, nor was there any fixed distance between the craft. Sometimes 501 the same expedient was used for transport when the load was too heavy for two canoes separately, a device which is said to have been used more [171] commonly by the tribes of the outer coast than the Bella Coola. Canoes lashed together are termed ts-awundy.

Rafts, sstskwal-a, consisting of rough logs fastened together with cross-pieces, were commonly used on the lakes of the interior, and occasionally for river work when canoes were unavailable and there was no time to make them. Another expedient in similar emergencies was to [177] make bark canoes, such as are still constructed by the Carriers. The Bella Coola regard the construction of these as definite copying, and do not profess to have as much skill as their teachers whose canoes, it is said, can be folded for portaging. There is a tradition that, many generations ago, a few clever Bella Coola knew how to make skin canoes.

THE PREPARATION OF CEDAR-BARK

314 Early spring is the time to sstadumls, that is, to gather the inner bark [221] of the cedar. Men occasionally assist in the task, though this is really [462] woman's work. The worker selects a small cedar, choosing one about [412] six inches in diameter, with smooth trunk and relatively free from knots. With a knife she makes a horizontal incision in the bark, two or three feet from the ground, sometimes girdling the sapling. Then she inserts her

*776 Although Ḷomoqwa has often been seen by mortals, no one has ever been able to describe his countenance. He always wears a huge hat, beneath which his blackened face, covered with eagle down, is barely visible, since he constantly keeps turning it away from the observer. Occasionally he comes to the surface and has been known even to walk on it. Like other supernatural beings, he is able to ascend to Nusmät·a, though it is not his home. The dread with which the Bella Coola regard Ḷomoqwa is due to his ability to suck canoes down to his home at the bottom of the ocean as if in a whirlpool. He is usually hungry, and nothing pleases him more than human flesh. None the less, he does not destroy life without cause. It angers him to hear his name spoken, so no Bella Coola utters [502] it when on the ocean, for fear that he may be engulfed. When- [761] ever a person is drowned at sea it is believed that the cannibalistic Ḷomoqwa has drawn him down for a meal.

539 To insert the many stories describing Ḷomoqwa at this point *776 would unduly break the continuity of this account, so the following simple example must suffice.

Not many years ago four Bella Bella fishermen were trying to anchor near China Hat. Owing to the action of the supernatural beings dwelling below, the bottom of the ocean rose and lowered abruptly so that their anchor would not hold as the rope was in many cases too short. They were much annoyed by this and, as they strove to fasten their craft, they were exasperated at a lard-fish which kept swimming closely around the canoe. At last one of the fishermen reached out, seized it with his hands, and tore it to pieces, throwing these back on the water. Presently their anchor held and the four went to sleep. But Ḷomoqwa had seen the insult shown to the lard-fish and, as they slept, he sucked down their canoe until, on awakening, they found themselves in the huge house of the lord of the undersea world. There was no water in it, but they recognized where they must be from the fact that the walls were decorated with paintings of marine beings and with ancient tools from canoes lost at sea. An old woman who lives in Ḷomoqwa's house called the four to her fire in the corner and asked them whether they had any false hellebore with them. If they had, they would escape, but otherwise nothing could save them from Ḷomoqwa, who at that very moment was calling his friends for a feast of human flesh. Presently Ḷomoqwa entered, followed in succession by a number of undersea chiefs, 782 next day the weather was fine. This particular method of 424 praying had been learnt by one of his ancestors in the begin-821 ning of time, and was afterwards transmitted in his family.

[785] With the coming of the white man and consequent decay of [177] customs, it has not been exercised since the death of the grand-father of the man from whom the information was obtained.

SACRIFICE

782 It might be expected that a clear division should be made between the subjects of prayer and sacrifice, but in practice they merge into one another. A mountain goat hunter, when camped near a glacier which he knows to be the haunt of some dreaded supernatural being, asks help from him. He wears [824] dyed and undyed cedar-bark decorations to make his request more ceremonious, and after the prayer throws them into the fire, saying:

"Please accept these, supernatural one," thus making an offering to supplement his verbal petition.

If he is even more cautious, or eager not to offend any [824] supernatural being in the vicinity, he throws on the fire tufts [825] of cedar-bark, eagle down, and scraps of food as well. Whether [261] or not the objects thus destroyed by the flames reach the being to whom the request has been made, is a matter upon which the Bella Coola do not theorize; but the generosity and self-denial of the donor is appreciated, and a favour is often granted in return. A man who frequently hears in his dreams the voice of some supernatural being, knows that it is taking an interest in his doings and endeavours to propitiate it, by placing on a fire titbits of any food he has obtained, saying at the same time:

"W'ai, wai, wai," "More, more, more," that is, "May I receive more of the same."

A foolish person fails to show his appreciation of favours received, but a wise man never forgets to do so.

Likewise a person is careful to propitiate supernatural [502] powers when in peril. Both at Kwatna and at Mesatche Nose,

the point between Labouchere Channel and Bentinck Arm, there is danger from treacherous currents, so, when a shaman passes either of these places, he lays some food on the water and puffs eagle down into the air as he asks for help. If no shaman is in the canoe, this is done by the captain. 782 [133] [502] [756]

The being to whom offerings are most commonly made is Ṫhitcäplilän-a, the supernatural woman who cures the sick and gives power to shamans. Whenever a hunter kills an edible animal in the forest, he cuts off four pieces of flesh and throws them into his fire to gain her goodwill. Long, long ago, Ṫhitcäplilän-a appeared to a hunter, seized some of his quarry, and told him of her wishes with regard to presents; these have since been obeyed by wise people. Similarly, the relatives of a man absent in the mountains or at sea throw scraps of food on the fire and ask the protection of Ṫhitcäplilän-a for the one in danger. In this case, it is clear that objects thrown into flames are received and appreciated by Ṫhitcäplilän-a. [776] [224] [773]

Mnakais, although usually propitiated by prayer, is also given presents. Frequently, when a man is praying, he accompanies his words by blowing up into the air small particles of eagle down. Prayers in connection with the departure of war or hunting expeditions have already been mentioned, but before starting on any journey by canoe, the captain is careful to pray and to throw upon the water four pieces of red, and four of yellow cedar-bark. The blowing upwards of eagle down is a common accompaniment to all kinds of prayers, but, if none is available, cedar-bark can be used equally satisfactorily. If possible, this is cast on the surface of water, otherwise into a fire, as a request is being made. The Bella Coola do not believe that such presents are actually used and considered valuable by Ähqumäm, but they emphasize and accompany the vocal prayer, and demonstrate the petitioner's sincerity. [776] [484] [824] [825]

Ghosts, on the other hand, depend almost entirely on presents given them by mortals, since food is not abundant in the land below. The relatives of a dead person always throw 775 782

a man, ur-unaiza, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience 424 to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it 463 has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this func- 551
tion. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the valid- 693
ation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but [793]
non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name ur-unaiza has always been able to perform his duties.

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been en- 784
forced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, 825 otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the 226
same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe
lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them [515]
from seeing the route. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the 841
fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the [562] bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive stakes for olachen nets.

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can be set afloat, and even a canoe which has just been completed [502] must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at [765]
the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences.

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the 688
salmon and it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the 693 offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river.
The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by

258 tacles; metal coal-oil cans are found convenient for this purpose and have [41·5] almost replaced watertight boxes. After repeated stirrings and skimmings, all that remains is a mass of putrid flesh, bearing no resemblance whatever to the fish from which it came. The Kitlobe are said to com-[171] press this into cakes for eating, but the Bella Coola throw it away. Some cooks bail out the dregs by hand, but many of the box-kettles have a [415] bung-hole at the bottom which, when opened, allows the semi-liquid remains to flow out into a rough trough leading to the river. As soon as one batch of olachen has thus been disposed of, another is boiled and [439] refined in the same way. The grease keeps indefinitely and is a useful [262] article of barter with the Carriers as well as a staple of Bella Coola diet.
Although the preparation removes much of its offensive odour, olachen grease has an unpleasant taste to the white man.

258 During the boiling, all other activities are suspended and the people spend practically all their time on the river bank. If the fish are allowed 476 to rot too long, much of the grease is lost, so men, women, and children are pressed into service to make the most of the short period. The men rise at dawn to start the fires on the bank, the women and children follow with food, and for several days the whole village camps, as if on a picnic, amid an indescribably foul smell that almost sickens anyone passing within hundreds of yards. There are tasks for everyone; the fish must be carried from the pits to the furnaces, wood must be brought, the fires stoked, the kettles stirred, the grease carried away, the fireplaces repaired, food cooked, and a hundred other chores. It is a scene of great activity, carried on with good humour and merriment, for the Bella Coola realize that they are storing up luxuries for the following winter. Even the dogs seem to share the general excitement, and do not disdain to eat the dregs from the kettles, which, when emptied into the river, attract numerous trout and gulls, to the joy of small boys with hunting desires.

BELLA COOLA CANOES

501 Although travel and transport by water is still as vital to the Bella
[505] Coola as it was to their fathers, the motor-boat is fast replacing the canoe, and the science of manufacturing their own craft is being lost. In former times several types were constructed, but only one of these is still employed —the spoon canoe, sa·tla, used on rivers (see Plate 21). These vary from twenty to thirty feet or more in length, and are about four feet wide;
they are without keels, and there is no difference between the bow and stern. Although one man can handle such a craft in smooth water, at ● 502 least two are required for a journey of any length, and four is the usual crew. The captain, who is either the best waterman or the one most familiar with the route, stands in the stern, the second in command in the bow. The crew take their places at equal intervals between, each 502 ready to work on the opposite side from the man in front. Each is provided with a ten-foot pole and also a paddle for use in spots where the river is too deep for poling. The rivers of central British Columbia are shallow, but swift, and their navigation requires considerable skill. Going upstream, the captain constantly seeks the smoothest water, where he knows the current will be least strong, and uses his pole to keep the craft headed in the right direction. Should it be caught in a violent eddy, he exerts his full strength, and it is his voice that rallies the crew for a final exertion to shove the canoe through. Coming downstream is more dangerous though less wearying. The water is so cold and the current so swift that a capsizing usually causes the drowning of one or more of the occupants, and the captain must never relax. Spoon canoes are very [501] stable, and cannot be upset by a faulty distribution of weight. This is essential in view of the rapids, but they are heavy and cumbersome, unsuited to carrying large loads.

When a carpenter wishes to make a canoe, he fells a cedar of suitable 396 size and trims off bark and branches to leave the central stem available. Slowly and laboriously he chips with his adze until he has hollowed out [412] the trunk to the proper shape, and at the same time has smoothed away the outer surface. Sometimes a small fire is built on the trunk so that it will char the wood beneath and make it easier to remove, but the carpenter must be careful that the flames do not spread too far. Finally, as his work reaches completion, he becomes even more painstaking than before. The sides and bottom are whittled to a thickness of no more than three inches, and at this stage a faulty stroke may pierce the shell and ruin the toil of weeks. When completed, it is necessary to widen and harden the canoe. A fire is built beside it and stones thrown into the flames to heat; then lifted out and dropped into the water with which the craft has been partly filled. Steam rises, and the carpenter confines it by covering the canoe with matting, at the same time endeavouring to pull and force the sides apart. Sometimes he can do so by mere muscular effort, more often it is necessary to lay transverse thwarts within and, by pounding them downwards, extend the sides. No great extension is possible, nor is it required, but the steaming process is considered to harden the wood as well as widen the canoe.

Until five or ten years ago, the Bella Coola made another type of 501 canoe, dina, for use on the ocean. A few examples of this style are still in existence (see Plate 22). Though approximately the same length as river canoes, they are proportionately much deeper and narrower, and an extension downwards near the stern serves in place of a keel. These craft are sufficiently sea-worthy to weather any ordinary storm. Several the front-door facing the river, but has to leave the house 784 through the trap beneath the enclosure where she sleeps. The 881 Bella Coola consider it unthinkable for a girl to disregard these prohibitions, but if this should happen, she would be chased home by her parents, by the Guardian of the River, or, in fact, by any elderly member of the community. The strongest [761] reason for respecting these regulations is the belief that disobedience brings death; no one knows how it is inflicted, but a careless girl soon dies. During this period, she cannot eat [262] fresh salmon, though she is allowed them if they have been smoked for four or five days. Her scanty meals are brought to her in the enclosure where she is virtually a prisoner. It is true that she can leave it and wander in the woods, but her com- [783] rades avoid her as being in an unclean condition of which they are afraid, and she is barred from taking part in all activities by the river which constitute so large a part of the life of the Bella Coola. A girl cannot pick berries during this time, as no [222] more would grow in the valley which she had thus defiled; she must not touch anyone, nor allow anyone to touch her; she must not pass in front of a man; she must go to bed before [513] everyone else in the house, and be the last to arise. The danger of breaking some taboo is so great that it is safer for a girl to [867] remain within her enclosure where her mother, and other old women, gather to tell her the many things which it is fitting for an adult woman to know. This seclusion is not pleasant, but it unquestionably serves to emphasize the importance of married life to which it is a prelude. The writer remembers an occasion when a Bella Coola family was eating tasty fresh salmon while one of the daughters, who had recently reached adolescence, watched enviously. Her grandfather rose and gave the child an orange, remarking that in his youth little girls did not receive such dainties to ameliorate their lot.

Adolescent girls wear certain distinctive articles of clothing 881 and ornaments. The most noticeable is a skull-cap bound [292] with grass; this is the only time in a woman's life that a hat is [301] worn. She also wears ear-rings, each consisting of a neat [439]

tiful, of which they planned to collect a supply. In the course of their journey *Dudzzeng*ʷ saw a man who, when he drew near, turned into a piece of hanging moss. A little later he again saw a figure, but on approaching it became a tree. *Dudzzeng*ʷ and his wife walked on and presently the former once more beheld a man; this time the apparition changed to a fir tree. It was evident to *Dudzzeng*ʷ that a supernatural being had manifested itself to him, and he told his wife that they must return. On reaching home he related his experience and gave a shaman's dance. 539 756* 787

From this experience he had received the power of curing. He could see disease when it was invisible to all others, and could summon it to himself, where it was harmless, thus restoring the patient to health. He made for himself a rattle, shaped like a bird; this had the ability of dancing of its own accord, and would catch people's hair in its opening and closing beak. The sick were brought to *Dudzzeng*ʷ from all over the valley. One day he travelled by canoe down to Sneef where he found many of the villagers seriously ill. His arrival was quite fortuitous, for he was unaware of the epidemic that was raging. The inhabitants sought his help, so he landed and cured them. He entered the house of a woman who claimed to be ill, and took the sickness upon himself, but no sooner had he left than he fell down stricken. He demanded to be taken home in his canoe, but he only lived two days after his return. The woman had been in pain from her menses; it was this that he had taken upon himself and caused his death. 539 756* [761] [785] [841]

In consequence of the danger attached to the vocation, many people try to avoid becoming shamans, though if Thiteplilin-a should appear to a man when ill, he cannot escape the power. The usual method of prevention is for a man to hold intercourse with his wife from below, so that her flesh, impure through its liability to menses, can form a barrier to the coming of supernatural power. One who wishes to escape always sleeps on the left of his wife, whereas if he is seeking shaman's power he sleeps on the right. Another method of avoidance is to use the hole in the floor which serves as exit and entrance to the house of a girl secluded following adolescence. 756* [787] [833] [513]

Since the power of a shaman is obtained by a personal experience, and lacks both form and substance, it cannot be transmitted and disappears at the owner's death. As has been

*575 but the kukusiut all understand that later performances by *796 those with the same name are only possible with the assistance of carpenters. This dance has not been carried out for so many years that the details have been forgotten.

THE DANCE OF THE BIRDS

*575 The Bella Coola notice that in autumn many of the birds
*796 disappear, to be seen no more until spring. Ignorant of a warmer climate to the south and of the causes of migration, 825 they explain the phenomenon by saying that Alquntäm collects [776] the birds in some mysterious place for the winter and releases them in the spring. It is believed that he does the same with supernatural birds in the land above. The setting free of the [424] birds, which is in effect a scattering, is known as nusqwekstl
[551] and is personified; he is the patron of a kusiut named Qaeta. For the nekusam of this man's dance a huge circular cage con-
[532] taining wooden birds is constructed. By means of a regular maze of hidden strings they are made to "fly," to the extreme amazement of the uninitiated. This is one of the most complicated kusiut rites. Contrary to the usual practice, no eagle down is used for fear that it might settle on the strings and betray their existence to the spectators.

THE DANCE OF DARKNESS AND SLEEP

*796 The patron of this dance is a being who has the power of bringing nightfall, and later, sleep. In accordance with his 776 double function, a dual personality is attributed to him. In 821 fact, he is almost two beings; as Sunqlominit, "Darkness," he [513] causes night to come once every twenty-four hours, whereupon [532] as Sicitoma, he brings sleep. His kusiut protégé displays on nekusam figures with black painted masks, representing both [424] phases of his patron.

THE DANCE OF THE WHIRLWIND

Whirlwinds, though of rare occurrence in British Columbia, are known to the Bella Coola who believe that they are caused by the being Swalsiarmanem. Like all supernatural creatures, 614 extinct, are unusual; normally, the group is largely centred in one village, but with members scattered in other localities.

621. There is no central organization. It is generally recognized that such a unit belongs in the village where its first ancestors settled, and the leading chief of that village is, therefore, an important person in the family, though without status of [622] "head" of it. His advice may be appealed to in cases of dis-[553] putes concerning names, but he lacks judicial authority. Theoretically, the descendants of the elder of two first people are considered as "elder brothers and elder sisters" of those descended from a younger brother or sister; but this is nothing more than an accepted fact; it plays no part in the social life of the community.

552 In addition to human names, the origin myths include those applied to dogs. The first ancestral group had dogs, and these 614 animals had names, or were given them by their powerful
773 masters. Ever since that time their descendants can apply these designations to their own dogs. It is unnecessary to validate such names, but no two canines can be given the same one at the same time, according to the rule which governs the bestowal of human names. This matter was not investigated [539] in detail, and the only dog's name collected was one for which the origin myth is as follows:

> When Tāl·io was first settled in the beginning of time, the houses were built in parallel rows, one above the other, up the side of a steep [514] knoll. At the very top was a toi'et-house, built over such a steep incline that excrement rolled down the hillside. In consequence, one of the early chiefs living there gave to his dog the name, Nuliqwmutl di mink', "Rolling excrement," which has since been preserved in the ancestral family of his descendants.

THE WASH-BASIN

A third supernatural element which must be in good condition if a Bella Coola is to prosper in life, is a nuskelusta, wash-basin. In the land above, Ałquntäm has a large one filled with water which, having been constructed by himself, is replete with power. When a child is born, a small part of this receptacle, with its contents, is reserved for him; the supernatural artisans choose the actual section, but it is Ałquntäm who gives them the ability to do so. A fortunate man, whose ventures are successful and to whom goods are attracted, is said to have a good wash-basin; whereas the ill-luck of an unfortunate person is attributed, among other reasons, to the small size of his supernatural vessel. The Bella Coola have no clear ideas about the connection between an individual and his wash-basin. Some state that it remains in the land above; others believe that its intangible essence comes to a child at birth and grows up with him, always near his body, as if it were the offspring of the basin in the land above. As long as it remains in motion the owner continues in good health and prosperity, but if it becomes sluggish he falls ill. Long ago, shamans knew how to reanimate a wash-basin, but since the time of the first people, when supernatural ability was common, this has been a lost art. Senile decay is attributed to listlessness of this possession.

River water, being a creation of Ałquntäm, is akin to the water in his basin above. Boys are always advised to bathe in the river at dawn; the act is termed äskelusam, a word connected with nuskelusta. A prayer is uttered while washing. The combination of verbal appeal and the application of water strengthens the petitioner's wash-basin and so increases his chances for prosperity. Until a few years ago, this practice was almost universal. Water is always considered a strange substance, obviously a supernatural creation, and believed to be the chief means of sustenance for a child after being weaned.[50]

Although prayers can be said at any time of the day, or at any season of the year, there are occasions when they are more potent than at other times. At dawn, for example, a wise young man is accustomed to go alone to the river to wash and pray. He enters the icy water, blows mucus over his hands, and rubs his body vigorously[21] either with a smooth pebble, or, if it can be obtained, with a stone taken from the stomach of a sea-lion.[22] As he scours himself, he asks Munakais to grant him long life, power, success, and strength. On coming from the water, he repeats his request, and then washes himself again. This process is repeated four times, making eight prayers in all. A young man who does this habitually, and in other ways placates the supreme deity, is likely to have success, and may even be given supernatural assistance by one of the many anthropomorphic or zoomorphic creatures. The underlying belief is that Ālquntäm actually hears the words spoken and, pleased thereby, aids the petitioner either directly, or by strengthening the supernatural elements in his body. [783]

Munakais has power over both rain and dry weather, and is petitioned for whichever is desired. When the sun is obscured by rain clouds, the Bella Coola pray: [821]

"Please clean your face, Munakais," or,

Before a man starts on a journey, either by canoe or on foot, he always asks help for his undertaking. [484]

"Munakais," he prays, "Be with me," or "Go before me," or, "Give me what I want."

Corresponding to the importance of the occasion, prayers are always made before the departure of a hunting or war [224] [726] [785]

[21]Urine was formerly used for washing both the body and clothing. It was followed by the application of clean water, and undoubtedly had a religious significance; indeed, washing purely for cleanliness was not habitual until recently. [515]

[22]The Bella Coola state that stones are often found in the stomachs of sea-lions. One specimen, considered of great value, was seen; it was indistinguishable from a water-smoothed river pebble. [296] [823] [825]

* 556 the best songs they have made for the initiates, and any of the susaok members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiates
575 dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no [535] material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiates, resplendent in susaok head-dresses, appear at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dance a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a lad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all disperse.

THE POTLATCH: SECOND DAY

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(1) Communication to the foreign guests of the new susaok
[553] names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(2) Payment to X by the members of his wife's family of the goods necessary to rebuy her from her husband.

During the Evening

(3) Repayment by X of debts owed to members of his own village.

(4) Return of a dead relative of X to visit the living.

(5) Distribution of presents to validate this appearance.

(6) In some cases, dancing by some of the susaok initiates.

[575] Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a wash-
[574] basin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up, and towards noon all of those invited reassemble in his house. Three river canoes have been brought in and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. Boxes containing large quantities of red elderberries and olachen a man, ux·winaisa, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience 424 to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it 463 has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this func- 551

tion. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the valid- 693
ation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary [773]
ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name ux·winaisa has always been able to perform his duties.

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been en- 784
forced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, 825 otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the 226
same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe [515]
lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them [841]
from seeing the route. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes [562] is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive stakes for olachen nets.

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical
period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can [502]
be set afloat, and even a canoe which has just been completed [765] must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences.

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the 688
salmon and it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the 693 offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river.
The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by ever object was desired, and then set in a window of his house so that the sun could fall on one uncovered end. The owner firmly believes that this stone has brought him money on various occasions, and will do so again, though whether he expects the coins to be found inside of the wrapping, or merely to come to him in the course of trade is questionable. According to Bella Coola belief, they ought to appear beside the stone, but as this man attributes any good fortune to it, he never has any difficulty in proving its powers. 777 823

This stone is also used as a means of increasing the efficacy of prayer. When its owner washes ceremonially in the river before eating in the morning, he rubs it over his body as if it were soap and requests it to make him strong, make him well, grant him his desires, and so forth. [515] [789]

Shamanism

More important to the Bella Coola than any other manifestation of the supernatural is that power which makes an individual either an ätukwala or an äskankots. The former is a person who, owing to ability granted him by a supernatural being, is able to perform miraculous feats, especially in curing the sick; the latter is one with similar powers obtained from a ghost.[2] It is impossible to translate either of these terms accurately; the designation "shaman" is accordingly used in this monograph to describe both types of supernaturally endowed individuals. The most common and most important method of obtaining such power is from a living supernatural being; a person receiving the boon in this manner will be termed "shaman," and one empowered by a ghost will be known as "shaman from the dead." 104 756* [787]* [788]

The Bella Coola believe that long ago men were so much more powerful than at present, and so close to the supernatural, that all were virtually shamans. The prowess and adventures 756* 773 538

is spoken of in the Chinook jargon as a mesatche box, that is, a "dirty," "unclean," or "repulsive" box, and this term is one which is mentioned whenever an unexpected death takes place, or whenever a coastal Indian is accused of loitering around a deserted camp or of stealing into another's house. The belief is not limited to the Bella Coola, but has formed the basis for criminal cases all over the coast of British Columbia. It is difficult to find words sufficiently strong to express the disgust, loathing, and fear with which the Bella Coola regard a person suspected of sorcery. 754 171 [554]

Ability in this respect carries with it certain prohibitions. A sorcerer would lose his power if he should wash or blow his nose except when about to commit murder. The one old Bella Coola now thought to be a sorcerer never washes; he knows that if he did so, he would be immediately accused of plotting someone's death. This man is greatly feared, as he is said to have a collection of spittle from every member of the tribe; efforts have been made to break into his house and steal this, but it has never been found. He takes credit for the death of at least one white man in the valley. A peculiar impediment suffered by all sorcerers is a prohibition against turning around, although no one knows why doing so should deprive them of their strength. The explanation may be that their power would recoil upon themselves, a concept well illustrated by the following incident: 754 [515] [827]

When the first Christian Bella Coola left the old village to settle near the mission station, they were regarded with dislike and suspicion by their fellow-tribesmen. One day, one of them happened to follow a path through the woods which led her to a rude shelter in which was a bundle. Hastily summoning her fellows, they opened it and found an article of clothing belonging to each Christian. The man who told this incident described his fear at finding a dirty shirt of his own among the others. They felt that the garments had been collected by a young man who claimed to be a shaman, but whom they suspected to be merely the accomplice of a sorcerer, and this was soon proved to be the case. He was insufficiently trained; instead of touching the patient's body with his stick, he used to suck wherever the pain was located and then

[The Dance of Wil·a]

*575 houses. The night's ceremony concludes with a meal and the *796 admonitions of the marshals.

No further description is needed of the rites taking place the next day, that of nusiutälsap, when a second song is composed, again dealing with X's patrons, and wood for masks is cut. The evening's ceremonial does not last as long as that of lsuxtämem.

[532] The next day, gotlm, the carpenters work at the masks, some of which must be finished by nightfall. Late in the [302] evening both kukusiut and uninitiated prepare themselves
[515] by painting and washing; at this time the young men provide pans of warm water for their female friends. As already described, the kukusiut are the first to enter, followed by the uninitiated when all is ready. In Kimsquit they see the masks [184] of at least some of X's supernatural patrons suspended by cords of dyed cedar-bark from a sloping pole that stretches from the floor at the base of the back-room to the cross-beam behind the fire. It is said, although the informant could not guarantee the truth of the statement, that long ago masks had to be displayed at this dance, though it was optional at others. It is a serious and sacred time, one at which frivolity is quite [688] out of place, and the marshals are in readiness to punish any offender. One very old informant told of having seen a marshal strike down and kill a kusiut from another house for holding intercourse with a woman on this night. The heralds
*[203] stay near the door, repeating and enlarging on the remarks of [537] the marshals; the fluency of these functionaries always adds appreciably to the success of any Bella Coola rite. On this occasion X and the dancer of Noäkynm must perform, followed by those who have danced in former years, according to the desire of the singers; later in the season, when many kukusiut have performed, the rite may continue almost till dawn, for all must dance. After the departure of the uninitiated the kukusiut eat leisurely, while a marshal addresses them, commenting on the ritual and, perhaps, asking a man

[The Stomach-cutting Dance]

* 575 * 796 533 The singers have also composed a song for each of the änuyex and these too must be practised, while the men dance or remain still as they think fit. Since no uninitiated are present the affair is purely a rehearsal. The words of each of these songs is of the manner in which the patron helped X to survive his ordeal. By this time it is late and the kukusiut disperse after the usual meal and admonitions of the marshals.

* 575 * 796 532 The next day, qothm, the carpenters assemble early in the morning to start work. Since X is entitled to portray any of the supernatural beings who are companions of his patron in the land above, it follows that there is wide variation in his choice of masks to be manufactured. The principal supernatural beings are always shown, and any animals, since all are supernatural, can likewise be displayed. As usual, a few kukusiut are invited at midday to share the meal provided for the carpenters. The number of masks to be provided is often so great that two days or more are necessary for their completion, in which case no ceremony takes place on the night which would normally be qothm; the kukusiut merely gather [533] and again practise their songs.

* 575 * 796 But the day after is qothm. At dusk the kukusiut are called in for a final rehearsal of the songs, and then a summons is sent to the uninitiated, who have been washing and beautifying ● [515] themselves in eager anticipation. In Kimsquit it is customary [532] to hang some of the masks on a sloping pole behind the fire and [184] the sight of these amazes the non-members. First the singers beat out the song of one of the women mourners and she dances [781] in time to it, while the heralds near the door keep up a steady [535] stream of remarks, encouraging the woman to perform yet [834] more strenuously and to have no modesty about shaking her breasts. Then another of the women dances, followed in succession by the third and fourth if that is the number who sang the mourning songs. Next the änuyex perform, each in succession accompanying the song composed for him. Now comes the central feature of the evening, the performance of X himself. As the singers strike up the shaman's song which he is to the aesthetic, their skill in dancing and dramatics is note- 105 worthy: no one who has witnessed a native dance can fail to [535] have been impressed by the performance of the participants and the stage-craft of the carpenters. The fact that no system [538] of writing had ever been devised has prevented the establish- [212] ment of a native literature, but the practice of passing down [153] an extensive folklore by word of mouth shows their narrative powers as well as their faculty for remembering details. At present it is difficult to appreciate what must have been their energy in earlier times when they faced the struggle for existence, armed with stone tools. Abundant salmon gave them [226] adequate food, but only when weirs had been built with great labour. Though game was plentiful, the hunter was equipped [224] with nothing more formidable than a bow and arrow. The simplest task required patience and skill undreamed of by the average white man. If the reader will allow his imagination to carry him backwards two hundred years, he will realize that the mere provision of food and clothing necessitated constant effort and ceaseless exertion.

Hand in hand with many admirable characteristics, the 356 Bella Coola display others which strike the white man as unprepossessing. A first impression is the untidiness of their houses. Exteriorly, they are often fairly neat, but confusion reigns within. Clothing, instead of being hung up, is left lying on the floor; bed-coverings are piled carelessly; dirty dishes cover the tables; dogs and children swarm over the floor; flies abound; all is dirty and slovenly. The house itself may be uncompleted; a window lacks glass and has been boarded up; the roof leaks, or the steps are falling down. Nor are the surroundings more attractive. There is one struggling flower- [247] bed in the village, but elsewhere the houses are surrounded by [351] wastes of mud where horses and cattle wander, dogs prowl, and [231] children play. In the distance the mountain peaks rise in splendour, but near at hand all is squalid and unkempt.

They are only slightly more particular about their personal 515 appearance. Dirt does not distress them. They wash occa-

515 sionally, in a half-hearted manner, but it is not unusual for a man to allow the basin of water in which he makes his ablutions to remain standing for two or three weeks. Not many [177] years ago the Carriers taught their neighbours to make a kind [296] of soap from the ashes of burnt cottonwood sticks thrown into [388] water; with this clothes are washed irregularly and in most cases from sheer necessity only. In former times bathing was [789] a semi-sacred rite, but this fell into disuse with the passing of [177] the old religion, and the use of soap and water merely for the sake of cleanliness has not become a daily habit. The women [291] have more vanity; the younger girls especially like to have new clothes, though they wear them carelessly, heedless of fit. [796] An effort is often made to clean up for ceremonial dances, but it entails little more than the removal of the more obvious dirt and the putting on, over unchanged undergarments, of a sweater. Pride in personal appearance, love of tidiness, delight in a clean house, are all quite foreign to the Bella Coola.

356 Probably the reason for lack of comforts in the houses is simply that the people do not feel the need for them. They [264] consider it no hardship to sit on a rickety chair, scoop up food [231] from a common dish and, if they think of it, throw morsels [152] down to the dog or the cat. The smell, the flies, the dirt, the chaos do not concern them. Capable of undergoing privations, hardships, and even sufferings, they think neither of the comfort of themselves nor of others. Their domestic animals are 231 often treated abominably, not through lack of affection or cruelty, but from callousness. More than once the writer has seen a favourite dog steal a piece of food from the table. Its master, after a furious blow or kick at it, would suddenly, as if by inspiration, throw a choice bit to the animal, saying:

"Why, he must have been hungry!"

Though the Bella Coola feel a kinship with animals unknown to the white man, it is not combined with any recognition of their feelings as living creatures. There are, of course, many exceptions, but on the whole public opinion demands [577] generosity and kindness only towards human members of the group. The moral code is not concerned with animals.

756 magic probably originated from observing the many very erratic 825 and apparently purposeless movements of the red squirrel.

When one wished to cause the child of one's enemy to grow 754 up to be a quarrelsome person, a yellow jacket's nest was burned
825 and the ashes were rubbed on the face, hands, and arms of the 856 child. When the child grew up, it was believed, he or she would fight with everyone. The yellow jacket's natural defense of it's nest is interpreted as quarrelsome, even by white people.

754 The toad was a powerful medicine for the bad box used in 825 witchcraft.

To make a man or woman die of craziness, one of the hairs of the person's head was put in the body cavity of a disemboweled toad.

[515] To make a person's face swell and superate until death came,
[825] the little pieces of softened red cedar bark used to clean the person's face were put in the body cavity of a disemboweled toad. The idea underlying this was probably the reproduction of the warts of the toad on the face of the person.

[824] To make a person die, a piece of the young shoot of a thimble berry, lost by that person while eating, was put in the mouth of a toad. Death was supposed to take place in half an hour.

754 One very old man, Judas by name, boasts of having killed seven people by means of his bad box used in witchcraft, especially of having caused the death of Mr. John Clayton, who was the first white man to remain long in this area, having kept the Hudson's Bay store at Bella Coola, and later a store of his own, but who died far away from Bella Coola in 1909.

Mrs. Samuel King who died in 1922 was said to have been poisoned by Willie Mack. Her father, Captain Schooner, was said to have stated that Willie would die in July on the anniversary of her death. Willie Mack died in the summer of 1923. Captain Schooner died a few days later. He was said to understand malevolent witchcraft thoroughly. It was said that people often cut off the collars of Willie Mack's shirts. Willie Mack's father was too great a chief to that people were ashamed, and consequently killed Willie by means of witchcraft with something in a bad box.

CHAPTER IV

GAMES

517 121 [177] THE subject of games, lying on the border-line of social customs, was one which was not fully investigated. The Bella Coola, like all other peoples, have a number of sports and pastimes and although the old diversions are being forgotten by the younger people, many of the old men and women are familiar with those played in their youth. As isolated customs these may be of small value, but games of all kinds often preserve ancient practices and, as providing useful clues to the spread of peoples or of culture, are worthy of investigation. Unfortunately, lack of time made it impossible to give the subject the attention it deserved, and the few games here described must not be considered an exhaustive treatment of the subject.

526 [171] [628] Though less fond of competitive sports than the Indians of the Plains, the Bella Coola enjoy canoe-racing and wrestling. The former appears to have been an ancient diversion; picked crews from different villages competed amid the encouraging shouts of their fellows, and even now the younger men are anxious to display their skill in this respect. Wrestling, which [177] used to be common during all non-sacred gatherings, has almost entirely disappeared since the prohibition of the potlatch.

538 [517] The favourite sedentary pastime, enjoyed equally by young and old, is the telling of stories. Those of a sacred nature, especially ancestral myths, are reserved of course for ceremonial occasions, but the older men and women remember [825] many tales describing the exploits of birds and animals which are recounted again and again to the enjoyment of the listeners, although they may have heard the same recital fifty times. Children enjoy the companionship of some old story-teller and it is a common sight to see an old man or woman, surrounded by an eager group, explaining once more how Raven outwitted his rivals or was himself led into difficulties. Many of these [867] stories are somewhat indecent; others appear brutally frank,

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

but the Bella Coola do not consider this aspect and the children 538 grow up in an atmosphere entirely lacking in restraint of [867] speech. Some stories teach a moral lesson, but they are recounted merely for entertainment. At the present time, no [178] one knows who invented the stories; they have been handed down from dim antiquity and alterations or embellishments are considered improper, while the composition of new tales appears to be unknown.

Another pastime is smoking. Among some Indian tribes 276 the practice has a definite religious significance, but this appears to be lacking among the Bella Coola. Most of the men [517] enjoy either a pipe or cigarettes, and some of the women also indulge, but few carry the habit to excess. All the older people affirmed that their ancestors had smoked for generations. Tobacco was not grown, but kinnikinick, *milix*ʷ', was used, [249] and also a plant known as lsaix'. Another smoking mixture [824] was bark of lsxwatelp, toasted before a fire until dried and brown, and then crumbled between the hands. These materials [177] have given place entirely to imported tobacco, and the white man's pipe has replaced the native one. The latter consisted of a gooseberry cane from which the pith had been extracted; sometimes a small bowl of elderberry wood was added, but often the mixture to be smoked was simply placed within the end of the hollow stem.

Adults, especially the men, are addicted to gambling. They 525 are fond of placing stakes on a race or other trial of strength, and enjoy all kinds of games of chance. Some of the younger men have mastered a few of the simpler games of cards on which they spend a certain amount of time and money. The favourite gambling game, however, is one found in all parts of the coast, which is played with a pack of fifty-four smoothed crabapple sticks. The rules are complicated and no effort was made to learn more than the general principles. The pieces are divided among the eight or ten contestants and concealed; then one player guesses in whose hand a certain marked stick is hidden. If he is successful, the others pay him a forfeit; if

*556 phrased.[19] Frequently the singers alter the words slightly to suit the occasion, and sometimes compose entirely new words [171] for an old tune. As they sing, they are aided by some of X's friends who rise and stand between the fire and the front door.
[532] They occasionally wear forehead masks carved with his crest to add dignity to the rite.

203 After the song the chiefs continue their meal, and there is much practical joking with the heralds.

● 522 "Don't you want some food?" X calls to one of them.

*556 Without waiting for an answer he throws a box containing the liquid pulp, inclined at such an angle that the mess is spattered over the recipient. Occasionally, a herald will succeed in catching a box without spilling the contents, but usually he is smeared from head to foot, while the spectators shriek with laughter. It is one of the functions of a herald to be a laughing stock for the visitors.

*556 During the afternoon X's wife and the members of her 583 family deliver to him the goods which they have amassed to "re-buy" her from her husband. These are called "washing material," as if they supplied X with wash-basin and toilet necessities. The speaker orates how the wife has lived up to her obligation in making this presentation, and how it will clear the path for her children. These goods will later on be distributed by X. They can be used for:

(1) Repayment of potlatch debts, or

(2) Making potlatch investments, or

(3) Validating names, either susaok or ancestral, for the children of his relatives.

It would be most disgraceful should any of the goods be applied to validating susaok names for any of X's own children, because they have come from his wife's people and react to the advantage of her children in any case. These goods are sion by repeating loudly a few words, or even phrases, from the speeches being delivered, or calling on the audience to notice what has just been said and to listen attentively. A white man would be annoyed at such interruptions, but the Bella Coola consider them evidences of attentiveness. 203 556*

The making of comments is a duty performed at every type of ceremony, but it is indispensable at potlatches; since a chief depends on the heralds to emphasize and explain the points of his family history which are being displayed. One intelligent man likened their functions to a compass, constantly guiding the course of ceremonial life. Without a herald a chief would be as useless as a ship tossed on the ocean with no hand to steer. Although the principal duty of heralds is to extol the actions of a chief, they can, and are expected to, deride one who fails to carry out the customary requirements. Cases have occurred in which influential men have so far forgotten their function of generosity as to fail to invite their fellows after killing a deer or other large animal; or women have declined to share their abundant berries. Nothing is said at the time, but when next the people have come together for some ceremony, a herald refers to the omission under so slim a disguise that everyone is aware of his meaning. This public ridicule lowers the prestige of a chief to such an extent that he is careful not to offend again. Not many years ago, a certain Kimsquit chief failed to ask others to share some mountain goats which he had killed; at the first opportunity a herald referred to himself as Yeki, Mountain Goat, and all present realized that he was really alluding to the one who had been remiss. 203 556* 558 626 [224] [222]

Heralds must exercise care in their witticisms at the expense of chiefs because, unless public opinion is with them, the point of the remark is lost, and they expose themselves to the wrath of the person offended. Nevertheless, heralds always strive to cause merriment, and often take risks with this aim in view. They try to make humorous remarks, and also to cause amusement by their antics. As already described, the donor of a potlatch may throw to one of them a dish containing liquid food 203 522● 556*

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

203 in such a way that the contents dribble over the recipient;
● 522 sometimes, though able to catch the dish, a herald may
*556 deliberately allow the sticky pulp to cover him. The humour of this is increased by the fact that guests at potlatches always receive their food in a ceremonious manner.

203 Though one of a herald's duties is to act as buffoon, his position is only very slightly derogatory. In the beginning of *556 time, Raven himself did not hesitate to act in this capacity on [773] many occasions. Ever since, the post has usually been occupied by relatives of chiefs, especially by those who are unable to give potlatches. In some cases the position is sought by ambitious young men, willing to endure the slight loss of dignity for the emoluments. Since the basic principle of every Bella Coola ceremony is that the donor must recompense those who have assisted him, heralds are always lavishly rewarded. At potlatches especially, chiefs remember their dependence upon the heralds, and shower presents upon them. One who has allowed himself to be spattered with liquid food to amuse the guests, is suitably compensated, but in any case he receives presents for summoning and seating the guests and for interrupting the speeches. The same principle holds good in all other ceremonies. An elderly informant related that once in his younger days he had been dancing a susaok dance, when two heralds remarked that the ground on which he was dancing was dirty, meaning, that it had not been made clean by the distribution of sufficient presents to justify his dance. His mother at once gave the heralds two muskets, valuable articles in those days, to clear her son's path. These belonged to the informant, who knew nothing about the transaction until it had been completed, but he accepted as a matter of course the necessity of giving presents to heralds. If the seat on which a chief is sitting should break, presents must be given to heralds, and if a kusiut should fall when a herald is watching, the latter [622] receives gifts. At the marriage of a chief's son, a herald can [585] claim and remove any of the clothing of the bridegroom or his associates. Above all other occasions, when a young chief is to force his attentions on a slave woman if she objected, 836

although her refusal would be most unusual on account of his [567] prestige. There were no professional prostitutes; a man [548] usually gave a small present to a girl from whom he had received favours, and she was expected to give him a little, dainty basket filled with undyed cedar-bark to use as a sponge. Such relations appear always to have been of common occurrence. Today, as formerly, a man's morality is considered to 836
be his own affair; laxity may lower his prestige, but no law is 522
broken, and his neighbours laugh and chaff him about it. In fact, sexual matters are discussed with the greatest freedom, and a person who has been caught is mocked mercilessly. When visiting a foreign tribe, a man sometimes lives with a [648] woman and, on parting, composes and sings a song describing her charms. One man did this after living with a Kitlobe woman, and on his return to Bella Coola found that some of his fellows had learnt it in some unexplained manner; they used to sing it to him, much to their amusement, in part to his own, and somewhat to the annoyance of his wife. This perhaps illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola to an infraction of morality—where no marriage rite has been broken; it is amusing rather than disgusting. There 836 are no times when the moral code ceases to function. At potlatches, and also at kusiut dances, there appears always to [834] have been a certain amount of laxity, although this was strictly prohibited within the house where the ceremony was taking place. Such behaviour is due to the excitement and stimulus of a large gathering, not to anything connected with the rites themselves.

Perverted sexual desires, like other matters connected with 839
the relations of the sexes, are regarded as concerning the individual alone. Sodomy appears to be unknown. Intercourse 836
by pre-adolescents is held to be disgusting, but carries with it no social ostracism. Incestuous union, however, is mildly anti- 835 social; it exposes the offender to secret contempt, but does not interfere with his attainment of whatever position his wealth 556

* 575 air, throwing his arms around as if demented, and at times
* 796 hurling his rod to the floor where the nail prevents it from falling, much to the amazement of the uninitiated. He stoops 532 to pick it up, reverses it, again throws it to the ground, and 776 again lifts it up, all the time gyrating on himself. Finally, with a rush and a leap, he disappears behind the screen whence he came. One of the senior kukusiut, selected for the purpose on account of his knowledge and intelligence, is stationed near the enclosure, and as soon as the supernatural being disappears he explains to non-members who was the visitor. The ever-talkative Ano'likwolsaix confirms and supplements his remarks.

The next to appear is a mätsqus, a wooden figure about two and a half feet in length with proportions equal to those of a toad. It emerges from the matting at one side of the house, and by means of concealed ropes is made to hop across the floor and return. Behind it there appears a masked male figure carrying a huge wooden hammer; the kukusiut shriek, "Kill! Kill!" and the man strikes at the toad-like creature. It has been made in two sections which can be pulled apart by a skilful manipulation of the ropes; this is done as the hammer descends so that it strikes a bladder filled with red dye in the interior. The colouring spatters in all directions like blood, but after a short interval the animal is pulled together and hops off to the enclosure. The kusiut announcer tells the uninitiated:

"That is a toad from the land above, a mätsqus, which came to visit X. It will soon return to its own home."

After a short pause to let the effect of the last apparition sink in upon non-members, the kukusiut raise the cry:

"Look up there."

A porcupine emerges from a small hole in the matting and crawls down a plank, then turns and goes back, pulled by ropes invisible in the semi-gloom. The figure consists of a real skin carefully stripped off and stretched over a wooden framework. The announcer declares:

"It is a porcupine from above, come to visit X."

• [522] Two clowns now appear together. Each wears a mask,

representing a man whose mouth is open and whose face is wrinkled in a grin spreading from ear to ear. They go around the fire laughing and playing, rolling on the floor and indulging in all kinds of antics, with constant fits of laughter, so deep that it seems to come from their stomachs. Only one or two men in the community can make the hoarse sound required, and they are always asked to appear as comedians. They are entitled to make witticisms, often of an obscene nature, at the expense of any of the spectators, and the kukusiut always join in laughter at the victim. Sometimes the singers beat out a short tune and the performers dance clumsily, to the amusement of all. When they have withdrawn, the announcer explains that these two spend their time in the land above playing and jesting. If the preliminaries are long delayed, the clowns may be sent out to keep the audience amused while waiting for the more important beings.

The Hermaphrodite next emerges. As previously described, he dances around the fire, singing in a peculiar nasal twang, intermediate between the voice of a man and a woman. Few men can do this satisfactorily. When the Hermaphrodite has disappeared, the announcer explains that he always remains outside the house in the land above where he plays with a number of women who stay there, and over whom he is lord. His face is that of a woman, his voice that of a woman, but he has masculine characteristics as well.

Then comes Sxaiaxwax, clad in a blanket of evergreen boughs and wearing as ugly a mask as the maker can devise. The pattern varies according to the skill and originality of the carpenter; a common design is that of a snout-like mouth, somewhat resembling a pig with eyes askew. Sxaiaxwax cannot speak, but he dances around the fire spitting, blowing, and making inarticulate sounds in his throat. When he has gone, the announcer explains that Sxaiaxwax is a very evil being who spends all his time trying to seduce girls, especially those who play with the Hermaphrodite outside Nusqulxwaista. With them he never succeeds, but sometimes he comes to this earth

verbal to physical arguments, and one occasion is remembered when the latter was shoved from a canoe into the river. 575* 796* 776

In the evening the kukusiut are first called in, to be followed by the uninitiated in due course. Thunder dances in the manner already described, though, if possible, with even more vigour and abandon than when he was only one of the performers in the Mystery dance. As recorded in that dance, he performs twice, on the second occasion carrying a rattle containing burning shreds of cedar-bark. After each circuit of the central fire, Rainwater appears and drenches the audience, as rain accompanies a thunder-storm. The dramatic skill displayed is always impressive, and a touch of comic [522] realism is added by the reiterated remarks of Tłoqots who does his utmost to belittle Thunder.

The time-beater for the expert dancer, Nixps, appears after Rainwater. When the ceremonial is carried out with care, he [532] wears a skull mask to show that he is a ghost who has come from the land below in answer to the call of Alxwolätinim. As [533] he beats time he sings a wordless song of the dead. The skill of Nixps as a dancer is due to the fact that he is a yearling mountain goat among supernatural beings. The uninitiated look forward with eagerness to witnessing a remarkable dance, but after a few violent contortions the performer withdraws, followed by the musician.

It would be needless repetition to enumerate all the supernatural beings who follow, so mention will be made only of those who are considered especially appropriate to the Thunder dance and who are accordingly shown on almost all occasions. Winter Wren is a masked figure which hops about in an agile [532] manner similar to that of the bird on this earth, and Rabbit likewise imitates the movements of an earthly rabbit. Ano'likwolsaix explains to the uninitiated that Thunder would like to [825] taste the flesh of mortals but that he is too big and too hot to approach them, so sends Mosquito as his messenger. The masked figure representing that insect carries a stick about one foot in length beneath his blanket, and runs around the house

575 796 776 [123] [781] with short, mincing steps. At intervals he pulls forth his stinger and rushes at one of the spectators, poking the weapon at him and humming fiercely. The writer took the part of a supernatural mosquito at one of the dances held in the winter of 1922-3 and remembers the expression of fear on the face of a younger member of the audience when about to be "stung." The victim was certainly afraid on that occasion, and if that feeling could survive the break-down of belief, it is not to be wondered at that fear was universal in the days when the kukusiut were thought to be possessors of supernatural powers. Another being who often appears at a dance of Thunder is Rainwater-Dripping-from-the-Roof. The masked figure walks slowly around the fire and Ane'likwelsaix explains that this is the water which drops from a hole in the planking. The Clowns [522] are never omitted, and always cause amusement amid the gravity of the rite. One after another, the supernatural beings appear from the enclosure, circle the fire, and withdraw, accompanied by the sage remarks of Ane'likwelsaix. Finally there is a long pause, broken when a masked figure slowly toddles forth. It is Snail, who started at the same time as the other supernatural beings but arrived too late to be present at the dance of Thunder. Snail circles the fire and disappears. At this point the uninitiated are expelled and the rite concludes as usual.

575 796 Dancers whose patrons are Thunder, Earthquake, Sun, or Moon do not confine their dances to the ceremonial season, but perform whenever a manifestation of their patron occurs. If [424] [821] Thunder is heard, no matter what the time of day or season of year, X stands up and cries out:

"It [he does not refer to Thunder by name] is dancing too lustily up aloft. Xwe ···,"

[789] The call of xwe ··· is thought to have a quieting effect on Thunder. Any kukusiut women present at once drone, then, accompanied by a number of his associates, X proceeds to the lowest house of the village where the same ritual is repeated. This is done in every dwelling, after which X returns home and

[The Ghost Dance]

*575 *796 [787] X's, where he is soothed by the four times repeated frenzied beating of sticks and his call returned whence it came.

During the rest of the ceremonial season X becomes mad at intervals and displays his insanity by rushing to every house and throwing dirt and sand. His ẽałuziat escort is always with him, and the procedure is identical with that already [424] recorded. X makes no recompense for the damage inflicted, so it is probable that his fellows do not regard his dance as an unmitigated pleasure, but nothing can be done to deter him from exercising his prerogative.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CHARMER

*575 *796 776 Although the Bella Coola are probably as moral as members of any other tribe, they enjoy humour of an obscene nature, and a dance which never fails to provide amusement is that of the Supernatural Charmer. The patron of this is Sximsximult, [522] [881] a beautiful, unmarried, feminine being who is also termed Ałiqmẽ-i and Nusẽmẽłxaix. She is thought to disregard the efforts of her supernatural relatives to restrain her, and comes to this earth where she bestows her favours not only on human beings, but on animals. Her protégé at Kimsquit is a young [557] man, Łẽłaiuks, at Bella Coola, a young woman, Kwałẽmus; [562] like all other ẽuziat names these can be used either by men or [424] women. It is said that Łẽłaiuks's prerogative is derived from the experience of an ancestor in past ages, whereas that of Kwałẽmus was initiated three generations ago by a very powerful chief. The ritual in each case is identical, so the dancer [533] can be referred to as X. Each has the prerogative of singing [532] not only of Sximsximult, but also of the being known as W'iwsintmał. Many masks are required at the nałuzam of either of these beings, so it is customary for X to perform with respect to Sximsximult one year, and to W'iwsintmał at the next or a subsequent ceremonial season, though the actual songs always refer to both patrons.

Bella Bella, Rivers Inlet, China Hat, Kitimat, Fort Rupert, [532] Smith Inlet, Cowichan, and as many more as X has wished, not forgetting Bella Coola itself. On at least one occasion representations of a white man and of a Chinese were used. Sometimes instead of one, there are two of each tribe. Each figure pretends to be pursuing Sximsximdt and keeps up a running fire of complaints:

"She left me for a worthless man; oh! how unhappy I am," says one, and another adds:

"Alas, I enjoyed her only once."

Each uses his own imagination in making comments, frequently drawing on personal experiences with faithless women. Ano'lkwolsaix explains everything, and the heralds echo the remarks. Sximsximdt looks around for a handsome young kusiut woman and says to her:

"How many men have known you?"

The heralds repeat the question and tell the woman not to be bashful, but to speak the truth. It is considered excessively [522] funny for her to answer a number in the hundreds, even more
[881] than the tale of Sximsximdt's lovers. This is a time when obscene remarks are allowed and, indeed, expected. A short distance behind the hurrying procession of those who have loved Sximsximdt and are still allured by her, comes a super-[532] natural being disguised under the mask of an old man. He is her father, who keeps giving her good advice and begging her to forsake her evil ways, but she pays no attention to him. Finally, just as she is about to leave, there enters an old, old 575 man with white hair and a wrinkled face; he totters in leaning 796 heavily upon a stick and calling to the woman to wait for him.
522 She heeds him not, but goes out of the house while he staggers feebly around the fire, voicing his complaints and his appeals. Ano'lkwolsaix explains that he is Simpiau, who fell under the spell of Sximsximdt long ago in his youth, and for whom her beauty had such a fatal attraction that he has followed her ever since. Pity for strangers is not a strong Bella Coola sentiment and the audience laughs heartily at the spectacle of the doddering old man in vain pursuit of a heartless woman who is forever young. A considerable number of kukusiut always accompany the procession, pushing their way out with Ano'likwolsaix and Simptcus. Several of them carry whistles concealed beneath their arm-pits and the noise of these serves to maintain the dignity of the occasion. 575* 796* [522] 609 [152]

So many masked figures are used that all cannot accompany Sximsximult into each house. Those unable to do so remain on the sidewalk outside, holding one of her lovers, a live male mountain goat. At the next house another group of the charmer's victims enters and the ceremonial just described is repeated. The same is carried out at every dwelling in the village. Sximsximus and her followers stop a few minutes at X's house before starting out on a second round, in which the same ritual is carried out. This is done twice more, so that each house is visited four times.

By this time dusk has fallen and all the kukusiut except those acting as escort to X have gathered in his house. Presently the uninitiated are called in. Sximsximult is standing on a low box behind the fire, encouraging her masked lovers to come to her, and bestowing her affections indiscriminately in a heartless manner. The rivals shove each other to and fro realistically and though blows are not actually exchanged, great care must be taken to prevent masks from falling in the mock encounter. The efforts of the unfortunate Simptcus to reach his desire are always a source of merriment. Ano'likwolsaix as usual explains the significance of it all. Sometimes a cradle is brought in, over which Sximsximult croons while a song is sung, describing her as the mother of many creatures of whom the fathers are animals. It is uncertain whether this part of the ceremony takes place before or after the sham fight or, indeed, whether it is not another type of nuluxam which X can use at will. The ritual concludes in the normal way with the expulsion of the uninitiated, the dancing of Ano'likwolsaix, [522] [533]

her house while the singers compose a new song. The theme is of her patron, the young male being, Kwat iwal-a, "The Big One." It describes how he came from above and went far and near over the earth in lustful pursuit of women, how each victim fell in love with her seducer so that she followed him in all his wanderings, how Loon befriended him, and how he exchanged his blanket for a covering of abalone-shells. 575 796 533 796

On nacintálsap when the kukuxiat as usual go to the forest, they bring back not only wood for masks but also the trunk of a large cedar tree, at which the carpenters work during the two succeeding days. On nakacaw a parade occurs of the supernatural beings similar to that in the dance of the Supernatural Charmer, but the masked figures represent women, not men, [illegible] and pays no more attention to his mistresses than did Scimscimult to her would-be lovers. There is the same licence for lewd remarks, of which Kwat iwal-a takes full advantage when he calls the attention of the young men to his following, and asks them how many mistresses each has had. 532 981 322

In the evening the uninitiated are called to X's house where the first object they see is the tree-trunk, converted by the carpenters into an enormous bird. Wooden wings and a loon's head have been provided and the whole is painted in imitation of a loon's plumage. Kwat iwal-a is in evidence, wearing a bird disguise. Presently a matting enclosure in one of the rear corners of the house is thrown open, and the uninitiated see the throng of his mistresses who rush forth, almost coming to blows in their eagerness to reach their seducer. Awitkwalaxis stands on one side and explains the significance. After the mock combat has lasted for a few minutes, a Cannibal begins to growl and the uninitiated hurry out. The ceremonial then concludes in the usual manner. 532

This dance differs from all other kwiat rites in one respect, since the call can come to X several times during a single ceremonial season. Of course there is no compulsion; she uses her own discretion as to whether she dance more than once, 424

[The Sun Dance]

Ana'lîkwulaix, and two of the supernatural Clowns. In addition a white disk, about four feet in diameter, is ordered with a human face in the centre; this represents the Sun with Alqwstûm. No detailed description is required until the night of nakwam. 575* 796* [532]

The kukuxiut gather in the dusk and summon the uninitiated as soon as all is in readiness. On entering, they see the huge and imposing figure of Alqwstûm standing in the centre of the space behind the fire, flanked by a number of the most important kukuxiut as if to pay respect to him. X stands immediately behind, repeatedly throwing one arm over Alqwstûm's head and crying hoip to soothe the visitor. The two Clowns move to and fro, all over the house, making what remarks they like as if they were spoilt children. Ana'lîkwulaix stands on one side, explaining the meaning of it all, and giving the names of the supernatural beings represented. Suddenly the white disk appears against the back wall near the roof, slowly passes sunwise across the house, and disappears. The uninitiated recognize that it is not the Sun, but to them it seems miraculous that this body can move as it does, and they easily accept Ana'lîkwulaix's explanation that this is the way Alqwstûm crosses the heavens. They do not know that for the last two days the carpenters have been exercising their ingenuity in arranging cords so that the object can be drawn across smoothly and steadily. Again the sun "rises," and crosses the back wall, only to disappear from sight. This is repeated twice more, making four times in all. It is said that sometimes the Sun is made to spin just before it "sets," but the method could not be learnt. At this juncture the uninitiated are sent home and the proceedings conclude as usual. [522] [821]

In addition to performing in the customary manner, X is required to dance on other definite occasions, without the coming of a call. According to some informants, X must sing of his patron at the beginning of the ceremonial season, coincidently with the prestigé of Nakwam. This is probably correct but details were unobtainable. In any case, when the [424]

424 thing" into one of his companions. The recipient acts as if 575 blinded, staggering around the house and colliding with articles 796 of furniture or his fellows. One after another receives the 787 same present, until perhaps half the company are acting as if moving in a dense mist. Sometimes they reel from the house, falling into bushes and walking into the walls of other houses, as if deprived not only of sight but also of all sense of direction. The prerogative of Fog was given to Ninitsamlaix (II, p. 244), but many other kukusiut enjoy the same right from other sources. After a short interval, the dancer goes to the victim and makes the motion of drawing something from him, thus recovering his sight and sanity. Fog is then returned aloft in the manner described for a Hummingbird.

When first told of this custom, difficulty was experienced in visualizing the attitude of the kukusiut to what they realize is a mere dramatization, lacking the presence of the uninitiated to give it zest and purpose. When several performances of this type had been witnessed, the difficulty vanished. The kukusiut enter whole-heartedly into the spirit of the affair, regarding it as a game, and yet as a game in which they must acquit themselves creditably. Each recipient endeavours to [522] excel his fellows in the realism of his performance, and his blind staggers never fail to cause merriment. The Bella Coola delight in acting, and this is an occasion on which they can indulge their tastes to the utmost, without fear of disaster if an error should occur, such as hampers them in the presence of the uninitiated. Moreover, each strives to assist the performer, and these two reasons combine to make the whole a success.

Although these prerogatives are often used on the nights of kustämem and nusiustälsap, the time most suitable for their appearance is during the ritual of sewadjut, which may be translated as, "The Restful Ceremony." The Bella Coola say that the word is derived from sewa, a pillow, and that the meaning of sewadjut is a ceremony of "Pillowness," that is, resting, combined with pleasant relaxation. In spite of the number directions. Then the joyful owner was able to draw back her crystal and the sick woman at once recovered. 424 575 *

Another prerogative of the same nature is lsubilia. As the kukusiut are gathering and before the main ceremonial of the evening, the man or woman with this prerogative can display it if he so desires. He stands up, stamps, then bends down and begins to beat with a stick on the floor; the singers, who know what is to take place, quickly join in. This serves to concentrate the performer's power, consisting of the ability to scratch the external genital organs. The sticks continue to sound as the performer moves about the house, acting in accordance with his right, and at the same time rolling his eyes and licking his lips. Choosing either man or woman as he desires, he calls out his name, and the person addressed must come forward to take his hands. The power is thus transmitted and the one so chosen begins to scratch, with the same accompaniment of rolling eyes and licking lips. 796 * 787

"It is sweet," he cries.

The power is then returned to the owner, who later passes it to another victim, until the marshals decide it is time to proceed to the main rites of the evening. The use of this prerogative is a source of never-ending amusement to the kukusiut. The only explanation given of this somewhat peculiar ability is that it is practised by the supernatural beings in the land above. Like every other kusiut rite, it can be performed only by a person who owns a name in which it is embodied. [522] [776]

Sio'msta, the third of these prerogatives, is to imitate the action of holding sexual intercourse. Like the last, its use is limited to the house in which a dance is taking place, and can be carried out only while the audience is waiting for the main ceremony. The performer, man or woman, stands up with a rope pressed close across his stomach, held with hands clenched at the hips. It is said that in this position nothing can pass behind him. The singers and other kukusiut begin to beat time to concentrate the actor's power as he stamps around in a crouching posture, crying hoip and shaking his hips. Pre- 424 575 * 796 * 787 831 522

424 sently he begins to grunt, and calls the name of either a man
*575 or a woman. The person so designated must take the performer's hands, thus assimilating his power, and in his turn *796 begins to shake and grunt, amid the laughter of all. Presently 787 the "gift" is returned, and later passed to another recipient.
Sometimes a modest woman shakes her head instead of her 831 hips, to the intense amusement of the audience. After some 522 time the owner draws his power to himself and the main cere-[776] mony of the evening proceeds. It is said that the supernatural beings above perform sio°msta.

The Death of a Kusiut

*575 A detailed description of kusiut dances and ritual has now 766 been given, but certain special features still remain. One of *796 these is the method of disposal of the body of a dead member 787 of the society. In dances which are completed in four days, there is little likelihood of the performer's death, but this is by no means uncommon during the long seclusion of a Cannibal for example. In this case there is no wailing, and the death is concealed from the uninitiated, sometimes even a wife being kept in ignorance of her husband's decease. A mask representing the patron of the dead man is hung in the house behind the fire as a constant reminder of what must be done. From the ceremonial point of view, the serious aspect lies in the fact that a call has come which has not been sent back, and which cannot be sent back by the receiver. The marshals discuss the matter and agree that it must pass to some kusiut, a near relative of the deceased, who is informed of the decision and does not dare refuse, even if he should wish to do so. After a delay of two or three days, the body is taken secretly to the grave and buried, while the kukusiut sing the dead person's song. This causes the call to shift to the chosen relative who completes the ceremony in due course. In the case of a Cannibal, for example, a considerable amount of time is allowed to elapse, and meanwhile the uninitiated are told that the kukusiut are still waiting and watching for his return.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the lsulkum, prompter, is equally important, though less obvious. As many as one hundred songs may be in constant use in the course of a single kusiut season, and it is impossible for any one individual to remember them sufficiently well never to become confused when calling them out. Consequently, one or more prompters sit beside the announcer, ready to whisper to him the words of the next subdivision. Prompters are expected to be thoroughly familiar with the myths of all performers and, since they neither announce nor sing, they are able to concentrate their whole attention on remembering the words which have been considered suitable. 533* 796* 575*

This somewhat complicated mechanism ensures a minimum of error in all important rites. Mistakes do creep in, however, and it is related with glee how on one occasion the singers completely forgot a text and substituted a description of a mask used at the rite in question. Moreover, even the solemnity of a kusiut dance cannot entirely check the love of the Bella Coola for practical joking. A blind singer once laid down his stick for a moment, whereupon one of his companions kicked it away. It appears to be virtually impossible for a man to sing unless he can accompany himself by tapping, and the frantic efforts of the sightless one to recover his baton almost betrayed his companions into obvious mirth. Occasionally, too, a prompter neglects his task[2] and the announcer is forced to improvise, while the leader endeavours to conceal the error by lengthening the pause between subdivisions. 533* 796* 575* 522

Marriage songs, shaman songs, non-ceremonial songs, and a few others of special type are sung by an individual, unaccompanied. The technique is, therefore, quite different from that just described. Dance songs of all kinds should, if complete, have the three parts; these are indicated as A, B, and C 533*

[2]During the winter of 1923-4 there was only one man in Bella Coola with sufficient skill and poise to act as announcer and prompter. He found it impossible to perform both duties and requested the aid of the writer as prompter. The texts were written down, and it was the writer's duty to sit beside the announcer, waiting for a nudge signifying that he had forgotten the next subdivision. From personal experience the writer can state that the task of prompter is wearying in the extreme. [123] group. The moral code is not concerned with animals. The 000 life of the Bella Coola would be unbearable to most white 522 people, yet they find it far from unpleasant. They sigh at present conditions, but there is much to amuse them notwithstanding. If several people are talking together, one is sure to hear bursts of laughter every few minutes. It takes little to interest them; a story they have heard a hundred times, the troubles of a neighbour with his wife, the eccentricity of a white man, the stupidity of the investigator, any of these is enough to cause a hearty laugh. When collecting information, [124] it was constantly necessary to joke with them; the most feeble witticism was enough, but they lost interest in the work unless kept smiling. Their sense of humour is not refined; jests [831] about sexual matters are common and are enjoyed alike by men, women, and children. It is not that their tastes are perverted, but rather that they have no reticence in discussing this topic, so they find it easy to see the ludicrous aspects of a subject which is ever near the surface in their minds. They have no hesitation in poking fun at their friends; a successful practical joke, such as hiding the writer's tobacco, is enough to fill them with amusement. If the victim shows temporary resentment, the glee of his friends is complete, and shrieks of laughter usually terminate the trick.

Unless the white man who comes to live among the Bella 105
Coola is unusually broad-minded, he is at first repelled by the 182 dirt and untidiness prevailing everywhere; even the people themselves seem unnatural. He finds it difficult to realize the sincerity of their religious beliefs, and the manner in which these influence their daily lives is hard to grasp. The potlatch system appears so grotesque that it seems to reflect a psychology diametrically opposed to his own. The force of public [626] opinion on personal conduct is almost incomprehensible. Gradually, however, he begins to understand the reasons underlying Bella Coola life. The potlatch becomes intelligible when regarded as a means of achieving fame; constant attention to supernatural beings is natural considering the firm conviction

*539 *787 small hole in his skin blanket and once more lay down as if to sleep, but fixed his eye to the opening. Soon there drew near a beautiful woman with long hair.

"Don't vanish," Keldcap said to her. "I see you."

The woman, not at all perturbed at being seen, merely answered: "Come to my house."

Keldcap followed his visitor, a mouse in human form, down under the earth to her home, a cave on the very edge of the precipice. One side of the house opened out into the canyon without a wall of any kind. Here the mouse-woman's three beautiful sisters were waiting.

"Let us play," said the mice. "Won't you swing us?"

Even as he was falling Keldcap retained sufficient presence of mind to thrust out his bow, in which his supernatural power was localized, and to which he had clung. It lodged in a cranny of the canyon wall, arresting his fall, and he, being small and light, succeeded in gaining a foothold on a rough path. He crawled up it to the surface of the ground at some little distance from the place where he had camped, but on the same side of the gorge. Full of anger, he made his way back to the house of the mice.

"Let's play some more," he said to them.

But the mice, amazed at seeing him alive, were afraid to trust themselves to his swinging, even though he promised that they should later have an opportunity of doing the same to him.

"No," they said. "Sometime we will allow you to return and play with us, and you can sleep with us if you like. You had better go home now."

Keldcap returned to his camp. When, the next day, he told his sister of his adventure she was terrified, and once more besought him to avoid all dangers.[12]

[538] [12]Though in this case the hero outwitted scheming women, it is said that in many ancient stories the reverse was true.

796 of goods used for his dyed cedar-bark. People always have 556 sufficient goods to validate kusiut prerogatives; in fact, if a proud person gives too lavishly to confirm the initiation of a relative, the marshals sometimes burn the goods, giving no explanation other than that the uninitiated must not be led to believe that a kusiut ceremony is an affair of wealth like a potlatch. Formerly, goods were given only at initiation ceremonies, but between 1880 and 1890 a chief gave presents, instead of food, at a dance. His example was followed, since none was willing to be outdone, although such gifts are still called "food." The name of the donor is always announced, whether he is the dancer himself or one of his relatives.

784 novice and cannot give a dance[11] until the next ceremonial
[796] season, that is, until one year has elapsed. The marshals instruct him about his costume, and about the manner in which he must deport himself during this period, matters which depend to a considerable extent upon his prerogative. If he [262] is a Cannibal, Scratch, or Breaker dancer he must not eat unsmoked salmon, nor must he enter a house in which either a potlatch or a memorial potlatch is taking place.[12] Failure to obey this injunction would warrant punishment from a foreign [302] tribe. Unless his prerogative is to give one of these, or the Ghost dance, he must keep his face constantly blackened.
[292] Every novice must wear a collar of dyed cedar-bark. The marshals warn him to be circumspect in dealing with uninitiated persons; he can talk to them, but it is most improper [524] for him to engage in any familiarity or frivolous play. Above [525] all, he must neither gamble nor take part in non-athletic games,

[11] A Cannibal novice, however, begins to exercise his prerogative immediately, although he must also perform a complete dance the following year.

[12] This prohibition was once broken at Lomqo·ts. A skilled leader was required to arrange the texts at a memorial potlatch and the only man fit for the purpose, a resident of Sunul, was a Cannibal novice. After much deliberation he was called upon, but great care was taken to hide his identity and it was years before the infraction became known.

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

prohibitions that last not for one year, but for four. X is not subject to any other restraints. If he wishes to go hunting he can remove his cedar-bark collar and hang it for convenience in the forest near his village, redonning it on his return. The kukusiut show considerable interest in their new member, not only by warning him what he must not do, but by teaching him how to dance and to growl or make other of the necessary, but unusual, noises. During the remainder of the ceremonial season X is required to attend every kusiut dance, thereby learning much of the ceremonial, and during the following summer his relatives, especially if food is plentiful, frequently invite the kukusiut to their house. The singers beat out well-known tunes, or practise those which will be required for the following winter; if a song has been composed for X he dances in time to it, in the style proper to his prerogative. Formerly, when there were many novices, dances of this type took place frequently and were useful in giving constant practice to singers and neophytes alike. As no calls from supernatural patrons can come at this time of year, it follows that all such dances are of a non-sacred nature, although the uninitiated are excluded. During his period as a novitiate, X has one privilege; he can take food from anyone at any type of ceremony. It is remembered that one novice was even bold enough to take food which had been placed as an offering for the dead.

575* 784 [524] [525] 575* 533 535 575* 264

When the next kusiut season opens, X attends every performance. This is probably the most thrilling and nerve-racking period in his life. He does not know exactly when he will be allowed to give his dance, since that is a matter of arrangement between his relatives and the marshals, but he knows that the time will soon be at hand. When the great day, or rather night, actually comes, X is usually in a state of abject terror. The rite itself does not differ from those about to be described except that the first song relates the manner in which X found the repository. But the mental attitude of X differs greatly from that of an old performer. One informant,

APPENDIX B

STRING FIGURES

THE only form of pastime which it was practical to investigate in any detail was the construction of string figures. These seem to have no ceremonial or religious significance; they are made for recreation only, and it was found easy to learn a number while paving the way for other kinds of research. In fact, interest in them was one of the ways in which the writer became friends with a number of Bella Coola. As is to be expected, some individuals are more proficient in constructing complicated string figures than others, the old women being particularly adept. During the long delays which occur in all the dances it is a common sight to see an old crone teaching a group of young girls the figures which she herself learnt when young. Some men remember a number from childhood, but the making of designs with string is regarded as more fitting for girls and women. Songs accompany many of the figures, and the singing of these is considered an essential part of the construction. It was stated that many more figures were known long ago; in fact, several of those here recorded were only obtained after repeated efforts on the part of an old woman to reconstruct those which she had been shown when a child. No attempt was made to learn all the Bella Coola figures; a larger number could doubtless have been collected, but those here described are the ones most commonly made.

The nomenclature used is that described by Miss Haddon,[1] in itself following the method used by Rivers and Haddon. It will be assumed that the reader is familiar with this, including the meaning of the terms, "Opening A," "Position 1," and "Navaho." A string about four feet long will be found most convenient for making the Bella Coola figures.

1. A SALMON-TRAP

Double the loop; two strands now take the place of the usual one, but these will be referred to as a single string or loop. The figure can be made equally well with a string one-half the usual length.

Place string as a simple loop over left thumb and index finger and the right hand.

524 Insert right hand from distal side into the loop hooked down by right index finger, releasing this finger in the process.

FIG. 4. "A Salmon-Trap."

Draw these two strings out to the right, allowing the original right hand loop to slip over them.

This completed figure represents a salmon-trap,[7] the opening pointing towards the left (Figure 4).

II. A WATER OUZEL

Opening A with middle fingers.

Bring middle fingers together, tip to tip; transfer right middle finger loop to left middle finger, and left middle finger loop to right middle finger, passing it over the loop just transferred.

Extend.

Insert left thumb into left middle finger loop from proximal side and transfer this loop to the thumb, keeping it distal to the loop already held.

Insert left thumb into left little finger loop from proximal side and transfer this loop to the thumb, keeping it distal to the two loops already held.

Release right thumb and little finger.

Extend.

of the small fish, or salmon roe, on which it feeds. Wriggle the hands and the bird shakes, as it does when about to dive. The manipulator sings: [825]

Molam	yästä	maxwatshka	olä	mälsinndji
Dive	down,	Water Ouzel,	to	your salmon roe.

The bird dives; the remaining knot represents the radiating ripple that marks the spot where it vanished.

III. A CORPSE

With left middle, ring, and little fingers hook down left radial thumb string and left ulnar index finger string.

With right middle, ring, and little fingers hook down right radial and ulnar thumb strings.

Bring right hand to radial side of left hand, to its dorsal aspect.

With right index finger take up from proximal side string which passes across dorsal aspect of left thumb and index finger.

Release middle, ring, and little fingers of both hands.

There is now a straight string passing between the radial sides of the two thumbs, and another straight string between the radial sides of the two index fingers, while the string passing from ulnar side of left thumb to ulnar side of right index finger crosses to the radial side of the string passing from ulnar side of right thumb to ulnar side of left index finger (Figure 6).

This common opening will be referred to henceforth as BELLA COOLA OPENING.

FIG. 6. "Bella Coola Opening."

524 Bring index fingers together, tip to tip, and transfer right index finger loop to left index finger, and left index finger loop to right index finger over loop just transferred.

Insert middle fingers into index finger loops from proximal side.

Bend middle and index fingers towards the manipulator, passing index fingers to distal side of radial thumb string, and middle fingers to proximal side of radial thumb string, grasping this string between tips of these fingers.

Return through index finger loop, allowing this loop to slip off. The string formerly held between tips of fingers is now wrapped around tips of index fingers.

Release thumbs.

This represents the corpse resting on a framework (Figure 7).

FIG. 7. "A Corpse."

Pass thumbs away from manipulator into the lower section of the central rectangle.

Release ring and little fingers.

Gently extend, and the figure becomes two stars.

IV. TWO BOYS

Place loop over thumbs, which should be about four inches apart, with straight string between their radial sides, and the long pendant strings hanging down from ulnar sides of thumbs on palmar aspects of hands.

With index fingers take up radial thumb strings from proximal side.

With left thumb take up right radial thumb string from proximal side.

Release right thumb.

Pass right thumb into left thumb loops from proximal side and take up both loops.

Extend figure.

Pass thumbs proximally to ulnar side of index finger loops, and take up ulnar index finger string on their backs.

Release index fingers.

There are now three loops on the thumbs which should be kept in their original order.

Pass index fingers through the three thumb loops from proximal side, and bend them down and away from manipulator to ulnar side of distal

and middle ulnar thumb strings, and to the proximal side of the proximal ulnar thumb string; by twisting the index fingers hook this string down, with the index fingers, through thumb loops. 524

With little fingers hook down the strings hooked down by index fingers.

Release index fingers.

Release the two straight radial thumb strings.

Extend figure.

This completed figure shows two boys, the loops passing from radial thumb string to ulnar little finger string, playing a game which resembles hide-and-seek (Figure 8).

FIG. 8. "Two Boys."

The right hand boy runs to try to find him: insert left thumb into right thumb loop from proximal side, release right thumb, and extend. This shows the right hand boy near the left hand, but he cannot see the left hand boy, who is concealed.

Sing: "hai' lə. Where is he?"

The right hand boy returns to his station:

Insert right thumb into left distal thumb loop from proximal side and lift off this loop.

Extend.

Sing: "tutwinmi qo'lai. Here he is."

The process of hiding and running to find can be repeated indefinitely, and with either boy.

V. A RABBIT

Bella Coola opening.

Insert middle, ring, and little fingers into index finger loops from proximal side, and hook down radial index finger strings.

Bend index and middle fingers towards manipulator, to distal side of ulnar thumb string, passing index fingers to distal side of radial thumb string, and middle fingers to proximal side of radial thumb string, holding this string between tips of fingers.

Bend index and middle fingers up and away from manipulator, thus

Release thumbs.

There is now a St. Andrew's Cross in the centre of the figure. With each thumb take up the upper arm of the cross nearest to it from the proximal side.

Release index fingers.

Transfer loop hooked down by ring and little fingers of each hand to little fingers of each hand, without altering direction of loop.

FIG. 9. "A Rabbit."

Insert index fingers into little finger loops from distal side, bend them towards manipulator to proximal side of radial little finger strings, ulnar thumb strings, and radial thumb strings; then bend them up and away from manipulator to distal side of radial thumb string, and to proximal side of the straight string which crosses the figure forming a loop between ulnar thumb string and radial little finger string of each hand. Hook this string on index fingers and return, taking it up on the dorsal aspect of index fingers.

Release thumbs.

[825] The loops just released represent the ears of the rabbit. With thumbs press the ears through little finger loops and elevate with middle fingers, thereby making the figure appear more life-like (Figure 9).

VI. THE LONG PENIS OF RAVEN

524 Bella Coola opening.

831 Insert middle, ring and little fingers into index finger loops from proximal side and hook down radial index finger strings.

With thumbs take up radial index finger strings from proximal side and return through thumb loops, allowing original thumb loops to slip off.

Insert middle fingers into thumb loops from proximal side and take up on the backs of middle fingers the strings passing across the palmar aspect of thumbs, returning thence to normal position.

With hook of left middle finger grip right middle finger loop and release right middle finger.

With hook of right middle finger grip left middle finger loop and lift this loop from left middle finger. 524 831

Release thumbs and extend.

Pass thumbs to proximal side of index finger loops into hooked down middle finger loops from distal side and pick up radial middle finger strings.

Release index fingers but do not extend.

The long pendant loops represent the penis. Lift the figure and bend the head so that both loops can be taken into the mouth, where they can be moistened so that they will hang close together.

Gently separate the middle fingers which are hooking down loops; this causes the penis to become erect (Figure 10). It is difficult to prevent the loops from falling apart, as they always do unless well moistened.

FIG. 10. "The Long Penis of Raven."

The two lozenges which appear in the central base of the figure represent Raven's testicles.

This figure is also called, more simply, the penis.

VII. A BUTTERFLY

Position 1.

With thumbs take up ulnar little finger strings from distal side. 524

With middle fingers take up palmar strings as in Opening A.

Pass thumbs to proximal side of index finger loops and take up radial little finger string from proximal side.

With little fingers hook down ulnar middle finger strings, allowing original little finger string to slip off.

Pass hooks of ring fingers into loops hooked down by little fingers from proximal side.

With ring fingers hook down proximal ulnar thumb strings, returning through loops hooked down by little fingers.

Release little fingers.

With little fingers hook down the loop hooked down by the ring fingers.

Release ring fingers.

Release middle fingers.

Release thumbs.

This shows the butterfly with wings extended, the head being the complicated network of strings in the upper centre of the figure (Figure 11).

To untangle the string—to make the butterfly vanish—with thumbs hook down palmar string and release index and little fingers.

VIII. THE FIRE-SEEKER

Bella Coola opening.

Insert middle, ring, and little fingers of each hand into index finger loops and hook down radial index finger string.

Pass index fingers to distal side of radial thumb string, and middle fingers to proximal side of radial thumb string, clutching this string between tips of these fingers.

Return through index finger loops, allowing these loops to slip off.

Release thumbs.

With thumbs take up ulnar index finger string from proximal side.

Release index fingers.

Bring thumbs together, tip to tip, and transfer right thumb loop to left thumb.

Bring ring and little fingers of each hand together, tip to tip, to radial side of left thumb loops, and transfer loop hooked down by left ring and little fingers to hook of right ring and little fingers.

Insert right index and middle fingers from proximal side into loops hooked down on right ring and little fingers, thus widening this loop.

Turn palms of hands towards manipulator, with hands pointing upwards, that is, so that the fingers would point upwards if they were not bent over to hook down strings.

*Rotate right hand counter-clockwise, and left hand clockwise, through ninety degrees, causing a triangle to appear in the centre of the figure (Figure 12).

This triangle represents the person to whom Snapu-ldl, "The Fire-Seeker," applies for glowing embers. Another person should take the part of Snapu-ldl by inserting a finger through the central triangle. The following dialogue takes place:

Fire Owner. "What do you want?"

Swapu-iäk. "I want some embers, please; my fire has gone out."

F.O. "All right. Go and bring whatever you usually use for carrying coals."

Swapu-iäk is absent for a long time and returns with her fingers and mouth smeared with grease. The assistant should lick her finger to lend realism to the figure.

FIG. 12. "The Fire-Seeker."

Fire Owner. "Why have you been so long?"

Swapu-iäk. "I was given some food by the people in that house over there."

F.O. "What did you eat?"

S. "I ate human grease."

F.O. "What did you eat it with?"

S. "A sop of dried salmon."

F.O. "What kind of dish was it served in?"

S. "A skull."

F.O. "What did you use as a table-cloth?"

S. "A cape taken from a corpse in a coffin."

F.O. "What did you use as a serviette?"

S. "A tuft of hair pulled from a corpse."

F.O. "Ugh! You foul woman."

Reverse the movement marked * and the triangle contracts in the centre of the figure, catching Swapu-iäk's finger.

She cries out in pain, "ăn-ăn-alsunai," the Bella Coola equivalent for "Oh dear!" "Ouch!" "It's too bad!" or any other weak ejaculation, and runs off without getting the desired embers.

This string figure illustrates an incident that took place long ago.

IX. A TUG-OF-WAR WITH A STICK

Place string over index, middle, and ring fingers.

With little fingers take up radial index finger string and ulnar ring finger string from proximal side.

With right middle finger take up left palmar string from proximal side, and with left middle finger take up right palmar string, as in Opening A.

Pass thumbs to distal side of radial index finger string, and to proximal side of all other strings, taking up proximal ulnar little finger string, which passes around the dorsal aspect of the hand, from proximal side.

Lift each dorsal string on to the palmar aspect of the hand.

Gently extend, without pulling tight.

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

524 Two loops now pass around ulnar little finger string, radial little finger string, and ulnar middle finger string of each hand, with the "apex" of each loop at the angle formed by the crossing of radial middle finger string and ulnar thumb string. In each case the open aspect of the loop is parallel to the palmar aspect of the hand. With the mouth, or the help of an assistant, insert a thin stick, about six inches in length, between the right middle and ring fingers from the dorsal aspect of the hand, through the loop nearest the right hand, then through the other loop, and out between the middle and ring fingers of the left hand. The stick should project an equal distance behind the dorsal aspect of each hand.

FIG. 13. "A Tug-of-War with a Stick."

Release middle fingers.

Gently extend.

The two loops tighten on the stick (Figure 13), and as the hands are separated the two "boys," that is, the loops extending from the radial thumb string to ulnar little finger string, are seen tugging at the stick. Continue separating the hands, and the winner draws the stick from his opponent's grasp and carries it away either to the right or to the left.

X. A MAN AND A WOMAN

524 891 Form the string into a double loop, so that each string or loop normally single is now double; such a string or loop will be described as single throughout. The figure can be done equally well with a string of half the ordinary length.

Bella Coola opening.

Insert middle, ring, and little fingers into index finger loops from proximal side and hook down radial index finger strings.

Pass left index finger to ulnar side of right ulnar index finger string and hook down right ulnar index finger string.

Release right index finger, but do not draw tight.

Pass right index finger to ulnar side of left ulnar index finger strings and hook down the two left ulnar index finger strings, but do not draw tight.

Each index finger is now hooking down two strings.

Pass index fingers to palmar side of ulnar thumb string, and by bending index fingers outwards, take up this string on the dorsal aspect of each, allowing the two strings hooked down by index fingers to slip off.

Release middle fingers.

Release thumbs.

This shows a man and a woman coupling up, facing one another (Figure 14). By pressing radial ring finger strings, with thumbs, away from manipulator, the figures can be made to come together in an embrace.

This shows the figure in the same form as previously obtained. The movements from ??? to ??? can be repeated indefinitely, and should be done a number of times while the manipulator says, "Kwai pais, Kwai-pais." With a little practice the movements from ??? to ??? can be made almost as fast as the word can be said.

Another form of Kwai pais is usually made from this point by repeating from * to *.

This figure, the second form of Kwai pais, cannot be repeated.

XII. Mistwala, or old woman

Bella Coola opening.

Pass the middle, ring, and little fingers into index finger loops from the proximal side and hook down radial index finger strings.

Bend index and middle fingers towards manipulator, passing index fingers to distal side of radial thumb string, and middle fingers to proximal side of radial thumb string, holding this string between tips of fingers.

Bend index and middle fingers up away from manipulator, taking up radial thumb string on dorsal aspect of the tips of index fingers, and allowing the original loop to slip off index fingers.

Release thumbs.

Take up with teeth the straight radial index finger string in the centre of the figure.

Release ring and little fingers.

Draw apart the hands, causing the network of strings in the centre of the figure to work up to the mouth.

Gently release right middle finger, at the same time extending the loop held between tips of right thumb and index finger, by inserting in this loop all the fingers of the right hand. By gently parting the hands, the figure in the middle, which represents the old woman, can be made to travel towards the left hand. The movement is sometimes improved by extending the left index finger loop by inserting in it the left thumb, and separating these two digits (Figure 16). As the figure is moving, the manipulator sings:[1]

O-ximsin-tsuts	yuthuit-ximsin-i
Where are you going	old woman?

The "old woman" replies:

xuhuqsiqsa-ili	ahshshhuiqsam-xiha
I am going to seek food	at the bottom house.[2]

The interrogator continues:

This shows the "Toad" sitting crouched, head facing to left, ready to [125] jump (Figure 17).

Fig. (1). "A Toad."

The left thumb represents a stick.

The manipulator then carries on the following dialogue with the toad:

"Gamamsk? Where are you going?" (addressed to the toad).

"E-chaddik, I am going to get some hemlockberries".

"Kaddikai ewahsalk skikiar? But how will you be able to reach up to them?"

A TOAD

(Second method of construction)

Bella Coola opening.

Insert middle, ring, and little fingers of each hand into index finger loops from proximal side and hook down radial index finger strings.

With middle fingers take up ulnar thumb strings from proximal side.

With middle fingers hook down ulnar index finger strings, allowing loops just taken up to slip off. The strings formerly hooked down by middle, ring, and little fingers are now held down by ring and little fingers.

Release index fingers.

Each ulnar thumb string is held down by a loop. With index fingers take up ulnar thumb strings from proximal side between loop and centre of figure.

With index fingers take up radial thumb strings from distal side and return, allowing original index finger loops to slip off.

Release middle, ring, and little fingers.

Take up with mouth the straight radial index finger string in centre of figure.

Bring thumbs together, tip to tip, and transfer right thumb loop to left thumb, releasing right thumb.

Transfer right index finger loop to hook of right index by twisting finger without removing string, which throws original radial string on to ulnar side.

With right middle finger hook down string passing from mouth to left index finger between the mouth and the point where other strings cross.

With right ring finger hook down left radial index finger string which runs straight across to right hand.

Release left thumb.

Gently extend the figure by spreading the loop held on hooks of left fingers, at the same time manipulating it so that the loops held by right index, middle, and ring fingers are of approximately the same length. It is sometimes difficult to get a satisfactory figure.

XIV. CROSSING A RIVER

Place string as a simple loop over thumbs and index fingers.

With middle, ring, and little fingers hook down radial thumb string and ulnar index finger string.

With right index finger take up string passing dorsally across left thumb and index finger from proximal side.

Extend, at the same time releasing middle, ring, and little fingers.

Pass left middle, ring, and little fingers proximal to left proximal index finger loop, and hook down left distal radial index finger string.

Pass right middle, ring, and little fingers proximal to both right index finger loops and hook down right ulnar thumb string—which is the same string as just hooked down by left middle, ring, and little fingers.

Pass right middle finger into right index finger loops from proximal side and hook down both radial index finger strings.

Bend towards manipulator middle and index fingers of each hand, passing middle fingers to proximal side of the straight radial thumb string, and index fingers to distal side of same string. Grip this straight string between tips of middle and index fingers.

Turn middle and index fingers down and up away from manipulator, taking up radial thumb string on dorsal aspect of index fingers, and allowing original strings to slip off.

Release thumbs.

Extend gently.

* A loop now crosses the centre of the figure from the angle formed by the junction of left ulnar index finger string with left radial little finger string, to the right palmar string. With right thumb take up the radial string of this loop from distal side.

Insert left thumb into right thumb loop from proximal side and extend this loop on both thumbs.

With thumbs take up radial index finger strings from proximal side.

524

Insert index fingers into thumb loops from proximal side and transfer these loops to index fingers.

Repeat from * to * with the double loop which now crosses the figure in the same position as the single loop previously described.

This completed figure (Figure 18) shows a woman, the closely pressed strings running horizontally in the centre of the figure, who wishes to cross a river.

FIG. 18. "Crossing a River."

The manipulator sings, as if the woman were speaking.

Qwatsarwoo	tsárwamxw'
Come to fetch me	across the river.

One of those who hear her from the village on the opposite shore answers:

Tsawalalal	als	sillayas
Go higher up	to	[a place where there are] projecting stones that make a causeway.

The woman does so. Release right index finger and she raises her clothing above her knees. By separating hands she can be made to move to the left across the river.

Another explanation of this figure is that it represents a man with a short leg who wishes to cross a river. As he hesitates, fearing lest he be swept away, his associates make fun of his deformity; he lengthens his leg, presumably by magical means, and confounds them by crossing with ease.

XV. A PORCUPINE

Bring middle fingers together, tip to tip, and transfer right middle finger loop to left middle finger, and left middle finger loop to right middle finger, over the loop just transferred.

Insert left thumb into left middle finger loop from proximal side and transfer this loop to thumb, keeping it distal to loop already held, and releasing left middle finger.

524 ulnar side of distal ulnar thumb string; hook down this string through thumb loops.

Insert left index finger into left thumb loops from distal side, passing to ulnar side of the two distal radial index finger strings, and to radial side of proximal radial thumb string; bend index finger upwards and away from manipulator, taking up this proximal radial thumb string on dorsal aspect of index finger.

Release left thumb and extend.

Release left thumb and index finger.

Replace loop held between tips of right thumb and index finger on left thumb, without twisting.

Release right thumb and little finger.

Extend right middle finger loop by passing into it, from proximal side, all the digits of the right hand.

The manipulator sings:[1]

Ayuwikiza-ina	nayatsskaid	ushiatsuw-ina	elzulty-ina
Don't hurry away,	go easily,[2]	when you go	to your house,

skalkulskas

Insert index fingers into thumb loops from the distal side, passing to ulnar side of distal and middle proximal thumb strings, and to radial side of proximal radial thumb string; turn fingers up away from manipulator, taking up this string on tips of index fingers.

Release thumbs.

Each index finger loop is now crossed by two strings; one of these passes as a simple loop around the ulnar index finger string, whereas the other is wrapped around the same string; with the backs of thumbs take up the former string from the proximal side.

Pass thumbs into index finger loops from proximal side.

Release index fingers.

Insert index fingers into thumb loops from proximal side, taking up these loops.

Release thumbs.

The figure now consists of two straight lines with two triangles between them, the base of each triangle (consisting of two strings) being vertical and parallel to the other; pass thumbs into their respective triangles, away from manipulator, and take up the bases on the backs of thumbs.

Bring thumbs together, tip to tip, and transfer right thumb loop to left thumb, and left thumb loop to right thumb, over the loop just transferred.

With the tips of right thumb and middle finger grasp the left double thumb loop, remove from left thumb, rotate through 180 degrees anti-clockwise, and replace on left thumb.

Repeat for right double thumb loop.

XVII. THE CRIPPLE

Opening A with middle fingers.

Pass thumbs proximal to middle finger loops and take up radial little finger strings from proximal side.

With little fingers hook down ulnar middle finger strings, allowing original little finger loops to slip off.

Release middle fingers.

Extend loop hooked down on little fingers by passing into each the hooks of the ring and middle fingers.

With middle fingers hook down proximal ulnar thumb string, allowing the loop hooked down on middle, ring, and little fingers to slip off.

Transfer loop hooked down by middle fingers to hooks of little fingers, without twisting.

Insert index and middle fingers into both thumb loops from the distal side and grasp the proximal radial thumb string between the tips of these fingers; bend upwards and away from manipulator taking up this string on tips of index fingers.

Release middle fingers.

Release thumbs.

A straight string now passes on the ulnar side of the central figure from one palmar string to the other; with thumbs take up this string from proximal side near each palmar string.

FIG. 21. "The Cripple."

With middle fingers hook down index finger loops, without releasing index fingers.

Place thumbs, tip to tip, with index fingers, and transfer each thumb loop to its respective index finger, passing over the loop originally on the index fingers, that is, so that each original thumb loop is now a proximal index finger loop.

With thumbs take up distal radial index finger string from proximal side.

Release middle fingers.

By extending gently the figure appears. The crooked figure near the left hand represents the cripple, the upright figure near the right hand with projecting centre represents a man with umbilical hernia (Figure 21).

The following dialogue in song accompanies this figure:[9]

The man with hernia sings:

Xai, xai, xai,	alkeltumx	diwlẓlatai
Hi! Hi! Hi!	Hurry up,	you cripple.[10]

The cripple answers:

Stuaiaiyustnu	dinuẓẓotai	xai, xai, xai
Don't say that	you man with umbilical hernia.	Hi! Hi! Hi!

XVIII. THE Snunq

Bella Coola opening.

Pass middle, ring, and little fingers into index finger loops from proximal side, and hook down radial index finger string.

With thumbs take up radial index finger string from proximal side, keeping this string distal.

Bring hands together; insert left thumb into right distal thumb and index finger loop from proximal side; lift this loop from thumb, but not from the index finger, without extending.

Insert right thumb into left middle thumb and index finger loop from proximal side and lift this loop from left thumb, but not from index finger.

Extend.

There are now two loops on each thumb and one on each index finger.

Pass middle fingers into loops hooked down by ring and little fingers from proximal side.

Each loop hooked down by the middle, ring, and little fingers is crossed by the proximal ulnar thumb string; with backs of middle fingers take up this string where it crosses the hooked down loop.

Pass middle fingers, still carrying on their backs the string just picked up, through index finger loops from proximal side, and into both thumb loops from distal side.

[10]The form indicates that a masculine cripple is indicated. [193]

Release index fingers; the index finger loop is now held on the hooks of the middle fingers.

Lift distal thumb loop from thumbs; this loop is now held on hooks of middle fingers.

Pass index fingers into the three loops hooked down on middle fingers from proximal side.

Pass index fingers distal to radial thumb string, and middle fingers proximal to radial thumb string, clutching this string between tips of fingers; bend fingers upwards and away from manipulator, taking up this string on tips of index fingers.

FIG. 22. "The snuuq."

Release middle fingers.

Release thumbs.

Gently extend.

This shows the snuuq; with thumbs gently depress the two pendant loops in the centre and the eyes become evident (Figure 22).

The manipulator sings:[11]

Nutpqals-kuuq	xûtskaitl	nupaxstla yalsqinu.
Reverse your eyeballs,[12]	it is too dangerous,	O, dreaded and powerful one!

Pass thumbs from distal side into the loops hooked down on ring and little fingers.

Bend index fingers downwards and away from manipulator, and upwards towards manipulator through the loop hooked down on ring and little fingers, and tip to tip with thumbs, releasing thumbs when complete.

FIG. 23. "Raven's Hammer."

Pass thumbs into distal index finger loops from proximal side and transfer each loop to its respective thumb.

Release index fingers.

This shows the snuuq with eyeballs reversed, appearing as a hammer (Figure 23).[13]

As the figure appears the manipulator sings:

Sutqumas	Qnax	ala sm-ama-als.
The hammer of	Raven	long, long ago.

[126] [776]

[11] The song accompanying the whole figure was recorded as song VII D 25b, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.

[12] This refers to the belief that the snuuq projects death-dealing rays from its eyes.

There is now a diamond in the centre of the figure, divided into two triangles by a double horizontal string.

Pass index fingers towards manipulator through the upper diamond and hook down the double string that crosses the thumb loop, keeping these two strings to ulnar side of thumb loop.

Pass index fingers to distal side of thumb loops: bend down, then upwards and away from manipulator, taking up the radial thumb string on the tips of the index fingers, and allowing the two strings previously held to slip off.

FIG. 24. "Raven's Viscera!"

Release thumbs.

This shows (Figure 24) the sumḥmnikdas of Raven, long, long ago. The song which accompanies this figure is in archaic Bella Coola and the meaning of the word sumḥmnikdas is not now known. One informant hazarded the opinion that it might be connected with a similar word meaning viscera.

Sing:

Nsumḥmnikdas	Qnax	alta sm-stus-als.
The ? of	Raven	long, long ago.

The string passing from the ulnar side of the index fingers to the radial side of the little fingers is crossed by two strings, each of which forms a knot around it; with thumbs hook down this string between the two knots.

Release index fingers.

Transfer loops from hooks of thumbs to backs of thumbs by rotating.

This shows the whetstone of Raven, long, long ago (Figure 25).

Sing:

Salsls	Qnax	alta sm-stus-als.
The whetstone of	Raven	long, long ago.

Place index and middle fingers tip to tip with thumbs, and transfer thumb loops to index and middle fingers.

Place right index and middle fingers tip to tip with left index and middle fingers and transfer loop from the former to the latter.

Place little fingers together tip to tip and transfer right little finger loop to left little finger.

The fire-bringer of	Raven	long, long ago.

Release index fingers.

Pass thumbs and index fingers from below between the two radial middle finger strings, taking up one string on the backs of the thumbs and one on the backs of the index fingers, thus widening the preceding figure.

This shows the box of Raven, long, long ago.

Sing:

Ta-kuu	Qnax	ahu xnu-xnu-ak.
The box [an archaic word of]	Raven	long, long ago.

Release thumbs, allowing the loop just dropped to be caught on hooks of index fingers; the figure has now returned to the Fire-Bringer of Raven.

There is now a two-stringed triangle in the centre of the figure; pass left middle finger through this triangle towards manipulator and hook down the double strings forming the base of the triangle.

This shows the upright house post of Raven, long, long ago (Figure 27).

STRING TRICKS

1. A CUTTING

Place string over left little finger as a simple loop, holding it with right hand at a distance of about six inches from left hand; this distance should be maintained throughout the movements by allowing more string to pass through right hand.

Pass left ring finger distal to radial little finger string and takeup ulnar little finger string from proximal side.

II. THE FASTENINGS OF RAVEN'S PLUMAGE[11]

Place string as a simple loop over left thumb with long, pendant loops hanging down on palmar aspect of left hand.

Pass right thumb and index finger from distal side into left thumb loop, at the same time hooking down the two pendant strings with right middle, ring, and little fingers.

Separate right thumb and index finger; turn right hand upwards, and clockwise, without releasing strings hooked down by right fingers. The left radial thumb string should now run straight across to ulnar side of right thumb, and thence across its dorsal aspect to radial side of thumb, from where it is hooked down by the three fingers of the right hand. The left ulnar thumb string should run straight across to ulnar side of right index finger, from where it is hooked down by the three fingers of the right hand. The distance between the hands should be about three inches; this must be maintained throughout the figure by allowing more string to pass through the hooked-down fingers of the right hand, as required.

[773 825] [11]As already described, in the beginning of time many of the first-comers to earth floated down from above as ravens. It is assumed that the plumage of these birds must have been attached to the wearers in some way, the "fastenings" illustrated in this figure. On reaching earth, these coverings were taken off without difficulty, an action represented in this design by the facile loosening of the complicated meshwork of strings. This figure was collected from a man whose first ancestor came to earth as a raven; his descendant consequently stated that the pattern represented the specific fastenings of his own forefather's plumage.

A Bella Coola chief and a number of followers were once at Kwatna where they had been gambling for stakes of mountain goat grease. Two of the men had lost their supply, so they went into the mountains between Kwatna and Restoration Bay to replenish it. They saw two goats, killed them, and at once two more appeared in the same place; these they also slew. When a fifth and sixth goat appeared and were likewise dispatched, one of the hunters tried to restrain his comrade, saying that such phenomenal success must be due to supernatural power which they should not abuse. They stopped firing, cut the grease from their quarry, and started on the return journey. Presently the mountain began to tilt upwards before their feet. They had no ropes, and almost in despair concealed themselves in a small rock shelter. Their dogs too felt the movement and barked in terror. Fortunately, the mountain did not rise more than a few feet and soon subsided, so that the men escaped.

The attitude of the Bella Coola to supernatural powers of all kinds may be termed a doctrine of Opportunism. Supernatural beings abound and constantly play a part in the affairs of mortals. An alert and bold man can take advantage of these opportunities and obtain assistance, but he who hesitates is indeed lost. Certain types of assistance are most commonly granted to orphans and other unfortunates; accounts of these belong to the realm of mythology and will be described in a later chapter. On the whole the supernatural ones do not show discrimination in conferring boons, and the man who is quick to take advantage of them is the one to whom success comes.

Supernatural Elements in Human Beings

The Bella Coola believe that in the human body itself there are certain supernatural elements. Neither sticks nor stones can move, because they lack these attributes possessed by men and animals. Considering the firm belief of the Bella Coola in the omnipresence of the supernatural, it is not surprising that they should ascribe the phenomena of health and sickness,

Libbie Dorsett R-5 (1922-1924)948
NRS Bellacoola NRS

Ceremonial chastity is considered almost a necessity to hunters, and in former years a man would rarely, if ever, set out to seek game without fortifying himself by at least several days of continence followed by washing. In the few cases known of a female assuming the clothing and activities of a male, she has been forced to hire a man to sleep with her on the proper nights before starting to hunt. But hunters are by no means the only ones to observe ceremonial chastity. If a man wants to build a salmon-weir, it is by this means that he makes himself strong enough to succeed; if he plays cards, good fortune is sought in the same fashion. The guests at a potlatch observe ceremonial chastity so that their host may not forget them in his distribution of presents, the host, that his guests may arrive on time. The hamatsa dancer thus fortifies himself for the performance of a dangerous ritual. In this way a man experiences dreams foretelling the future. In every desire or activity of life, ceremonial chastity is a potent means of success, not infallible, usually combined with prayer and in many cases with sacrifice, but a background and accompaniment to every means of propitiation. If a man has conspicuous ill-luck, it is because he has failed to observe ceremonial chastity; if he succeeds, it is because he has done so. At the present time there is living in the Bella Coola valley an old white man who for years has ranged the mountains in search of gold; he has been unsuccessful, and the Bella Coola believe that he will never succeed until he observes ceremonial chastity.

The strength which a man may acquire through the practice of this rite is almost limitless. A man may be ailing on account of the leaning of his tally post, but, if he energetically and faithfully observes chastity, it will become straightened, whether automatically or through the agency of Alqunsin is uncertain. After the termination of a long period of continence, a man's spirit is so strong that his friends place their hands on the back of his neck in order to absorb some of the power radiating from his spirit. Ancient myths record how the more force expenditure in a man's body by lengthy abstingiven as a slave to a Bella Coola, he was treated as a guest. Slaves were bartered between Bella Coola individuals as a matter of course. Their value depended on sex, ability, and industriousness, as well as on supply and demand. When there was an over-supply, the value of a slave fell to twenty or thirty salmon, but whenever an owner found that someone wished to purchase a particular slave he endeavoured to raise the price. If a foreigner borrowed goods in Bella Coola he usually had with him a relative as pledge. Thus, not many years ago, a Kwakiutl Indian, from near Owen Lake, borrowed goods from a Kitamaat man and left his son as pledge. The goods were not returned, so the son was sold as a slave to the people of Kitimat.

It was not uncommon for a Bella Coola to lose his freedom by gambling. At Ishq! especially, a player who had exhausted his goods not infrequently wagered his children, or in extreme cases, himself. If he lost, his children, or himself, became the property of the winner. Unless speedily repurchased by some relatives, such slaves were usually sold or given away at the first opportunity to a member of a foreign tribe, since it was considered improper for a man to hold a member of his own tribe in servitude. The same course of action was taken on those rare occasions when one Bella Coola village fought against its neighbour and prisoners were taken.

To the Bella Coola, who still consider a man's "power" in the land as dependent to a considerable extent on his ancestral myth, a slave's greatest misfortune lay in the fact that he had no ancestral home, and hence no rights.

"No slaves came to earth with the first people," they say.

A slave was a stranger in a strange land, unsupported by a chain of ancestors reaching back to the beginning of time. On the whole, captives taken in war were better treated than other slaves since it was felt that such a misfortune might occur to anyone at any time. They were frequently ransomed by their

*This is said to be an ancient practice, due to the fact that several of the forefathers of the Bella Coola came to earth in their canoe and were on friendly terms with the inhabitants. It is conceivable that this tradition may have relevance to the breaking away of the Bella Coola from the main Salish stock.

guests to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no admonitory crowbird to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the s'alt dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the crowd, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

S'alt crest names

Theoretically, every Bella Coola s'alt should be able to record the myth in which his name is embedded, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and s'alt names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an s'alt appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the s'alt can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kwaquitl nuqmal for his name Sa-calada which came to earth with Snauna (I, p. 552) in the beginning of time. Another Kwaquitl s'alt, Thelpalkum, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinaqal (I, p. 500), who assumed the designation of Thelpalkum after its performance. This early author had the additional name of K'ulaim.

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,* long, long ago, Sqamaim came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sumaqa, and a mortal, so he

STORIES ILLUSTRATING THE SUPERNATURAL

Stories Illustrating Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate —Stories Illustrating Supernatural Good Luck—Stories Illustrating Damnation

KNOWLEDGE of the contact between supernatural and human beings is based largely upon tales describing such incidents; in fact, generalizations like those made in the last chapter are, as has been already stated, contrary to Bulu Creole practice. Such tales are, however, so numerous and so long that their inclusion in the sections describing the kind of experiences they illustrate would have made the last chapter unduly cumbersome and confusing. Stories concerning these types of contact with the supernatural are brought together here, not as items of folk-lore, but as basic material to supplement the relevant sections of the last chapter. These legends are not family property, but are considered to be historical incidents which can be related by anyone.

THE MAGICIAN'S CHOICE

Four brothers, of whom the youngest was named Ebendje-ne, were very fond of gambling with coconuts-shells. They played in all seasons, but with such luck of success that they lost their goats, their houses, their mothers, their children, their wives, and finally themselves. The three older men went hunting every day, but Ebendje-ne [illegible] for with whom he or he also lost his children [illegible] die. Perhaps he had an inspiration; at any rate he was deserting his brothers, because as soon as they had gone out he went to get up and collect shoes which were plentiful before the door of the house. These were his sole possessions, but he also showed the lie of an old mahogany, which served to exercise his jaws. Before his brothers' return Ebendje-ne always lay down in his corner, covered with an old dirty blanket, as if he [illegible] Djendje-ce. During the day he spent much of his time aimlessly making [illegible] wooden darts and circles of pliant wood, such as are used in a game, and idly tossing these around. One day when he was so engaged he [illegible] someone come to the door, and looking up he saw a stranger [illegible]

"[illegible] coming to Djendje-ce," said the stranger.

"Come in," replied Djendje-ce.

The stranger was a supernatural being, though whether Djendje-ce was [illegible] aware of this is doubtful.

"What do you bet?" asked the strangeer, assuming that they would play with the darts and hoops which Djendje-ce held in his hands.

"Alas, I have nothing," said the miserable man, though all his gambling [illegible] were around. "All I own in the world is a dried salmon for which I am [illegible] chew on; I can barely keep alive with that and chewing."

"Come on," said the supernatural stranger; "I will wager this pair of [illegible] against your salmon fin."

They gambled and Djendje-ce won.

The [illegible] ended over the mountains, saying, "Go down to the beach and put [illegible] one of these shoes into the ocean."

Then he disappeared.

Djendje-ce placed the tree in the water, and instantly the sea was filled with small [illegible]-like fish called [illegible]. Djendje-ce caught and devoured as many of these as he wanted, but he did not chew himself, nor did he tell his brothers of his good fortune on their return.

Then the supernatural stranger again appeared, offering to wager another pair of shoes against one of the hoops which Djendje-ce had made. Once more Djendje-ce had was victorious, receiving a pair of mocassins which, when dipped in the sea, brought countless spring salmon. The following day he wore a pair which attracted the sockeye salmon, and on successive days he wore [illegible] other species of salmon, until he was able to attract every kind. Finally, during his brothers' absence one day, Djendje-ce, throwing off his disguise of lethargy, filled the house with all kinds of salmon. Great was the surprise of the hunters on their return; they asked him if he had become endowed with supernatural power, and he replied that he had. In exchange for being taught to gamble with crab-apple sticks, the supernatural one had so charmed Djendje-ce's eyes that he could see where the king-stick[2] was concealed; hence he would be able to win on all occasions.

[1] When the term used for a ceremonial party, is also applied to a contest in any game of skill, especially one in which teams or individuals from different villages take part.

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

796 of goods used for his dyed cedar-bark. People always have 556 sufficient goods to validate kusiut prerogatives; in fact, if a proud person gives too lavishly to confirm the initiation of a relative, the marshals sometimes burn the goods, giving no explanation other than that the uninitiated must not be led to believe that a kusiut ceremony is an affair of wealth like a potlatch. Formerly, goods were given only at initiation ceremonies, but between 1880 and 1890 a chief gave presents, instead of food, at a dance. His example was followed, since none was willing to be outdone, although such gifts are still called "food." The name of the donor is always announced, whether he is the dancer himself or one of his relatives.

984 novice and cannot give a dance[a] until the next ceremonial
[796] season, that is, until one year has elapsed. The marshals instruct him about his costume, and about the manner in which he must deport himself during this period, matters which depend to a considerable extent upon his prerogative. If he [262] is a Cannibal, Scratch, or Breaker dancer he must not eat unsmoked salmon, nor must he enter a house in which either a potlatch or a memorial potlatch is taking place.[b] Failure to obey this injunction would warrant punishment from a foreign tribe. Unless his prerogative is to give one of these, or the [302] Ghost dance, he must keep his face constantly blackened.
[292] Every novice must wear a collar of dyed cedar-bark. The marshals warn him to be circumspect in dealing with uninitiated persons; he can talk to them, but it is most improper for him to engage in any familiarity or frivolous play. Above [524] all, he must neither gamble nor take part in non-athletic games,

[a] Cannibal novices, however, begins to exercise his prerogative immediately, although he must also purchase a complete dance the following year.

[b] This prohibition was more broken at Kimsquit. A skilled healer was required to arrange the house as a memorial potlatch and the only man fit for the purpose, a resident of Anahulmo, was a Cannibal novice. After much deliberation he was called upon, but great care was taken to hide his identity and it was years before the information became known.

prohibitions that last not for one year, but for four. X is not subject to any other restraints. If he wishes to go hunting he can remove his cedar-bark collar and hang it for convenience in the forest near his village, redonning it on his return. The kukuriat show considerable interest in their new member, not only by warning him what he must not do, but by teaching him how to dance and to growl or make other of the necessary, but unusual, noises. During the remainder of the ceremonial season X is required to attend every kuciut dance, thereby learning much of the ceremonial, and during the following summer his relatives, especially if food is plentiful, frequently invite the kukuriat to their house. The singers beat out well-known tunes, or practise those which will be required for the following winter; if a song has been composed for X he dances in time to it, in the style proper to his prerogative. Formerly, when there were many novices, dances of this type took place frequently and were useful in giving constant practice to singers and neophytes alike. As no calls from supernatural patrons can come at this time of year, it follows that all such dances are of a non-sacred nature, although the uninitiated are excluded. During his period as a novitiate, X has one privilege; he can take food from anyone at any type of ceremony. It is remembered that one novice was even bold enough to take food which had been placed as an offering for the dead.

When the next kuciut season opens, X attends every performance. This is probably the most thrilling and nerve-racking period in his life. He does not know exactly when he will be allowed to give his dance, since that is a matter of arrangement between his relatives and the marshals, but he knows that the time will soon be at hand. When the great day, or rather night, actually comes, X is usually in a state of abject terror. The rite itself does not differ from those about to be described except that the first song relates the manner in which X found the repository. But the mental attitude of X differs greatly from that of an old performer. One informant,

Song Sung to a Bat(a)

These two words are repeated an indefinite number of times.

MISCELLANEOUS SONGS

*533 325 177 Gambling games have always been popular among the Bella Coola, especially the one known as lehal which may be of European origin. Contestants sing as they play, but the songs, lacking words, consist merely of a series of meaningless ejaculations. The tunes, however, are remembered, and certain ones are considered to be the proper accompaniment to certain games. When a number of men are singing in unison, they follow the directions of a leader, but at other times the "words" vary according to individual taste. The tunes alone are important, and it is often remembered from what area they first came.[1]

*533 177 A few songs have been adopted from the Carriers and are sung from sheer delight in the rhythm, since the words are unintelligible. The most popular is the following:

but the Bella Coola do not consider this aspect and the children grow up in an atmosphere entirely lacking in restraint of speech. Some stories teach a moral lesson, but they are recounted merely for entertainment. At the present time, no one knows who invented the stories; they have been handed down from dim antiquity and alterations or embellishments are considered improper, while the composition of new tales appears to be unknown.

Another pastime is smoking. Among some Indian tribes the practice has a definite religious significance, but this appears to be lacking among the Bella Coola. Most of the men enjoy either a pipe or cigarettes, and some of the women also indulge, but few carry the habit to excess. All the older people affirmed that their ancestors had smoked for generations. Tobacco was not grown, but kinnikinick, mile[c], was used, and also a plant known as ioaie[c]. Another smoking mixture was bark of ioweaiely, toasted before a fire until dried and brown, and then crumbled between the hands. These materials have given place entirely to imported tobacco, and the white man's pipe has replaced the native one. The latter consisted of a gooseberry cane from which the pith had been extracted; sometimes a small bowl of elderberry wood was added, but often the mixture to be smoked was simply placed within the end of the hollow cane.

Adults, especially the men, are addicted to gambling. They are fond of placing stakes on a race or other trial of strength, and enjoy all kinds of games of chance. Some of the younger men have mastered a few of the simpler games of cards on which they spend a certain amount of time and money. The favourite gambling game, however, is one found in all parts of the coast, which is played with a pack of fifty-four uncarved crabapple sticks. The rules are complicated and no effort was made to learn more than the general principles. The pieces are divided among the eight or ten concurrence and concealed; then one player guesses in whose hand a certain marked stick is hidden. If he is successful, the others pay him a forfeit; if

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

525 he is wrong, he pays them. It is said that in former times each stick used to be painted with a special device, and that each had its own name; even now they are beautifully made and highly polished by much passing from hand to hand. The Carriers [171] play the same game but use beaver teeth instead of sticks. Formerly it was not uncommon for a man to bet his goods, his wives and children, and even himself at this game. If he lost, [527] the persons so wagered became slaves of the victor unless [575] redeemed by their friends. Women, too, gambled freely; in fact, neophytes recently admitted into the kusiut society were the only ones to whom this pastime was forbidden.

526 Of actual games, the one most commonly played is iklia. As many as eight or ten contestants can take part, each providing himself with one, two, or three stones,[1] pecked down to the proper shape. Each is about six inches in length, three inches wide, flat on one side, and oval on the other, well rounded at either end. Before the coming of the white man, when the Bella Coola habitually used stone, it is said that one of these could be made in a few minutes. A mark is set up, and the first player throws his stone in the air, endeavouring to make it come to rest as close as possible to the target. The game is usually played on an open space near the village, but even on comparatively smooth ground there is great chance of bouncing and the thrower must gauge this possibility as well as have correct direction and distance. The second player likewise throws his stone, trying to lad it nearer the target, or to knock away his rival's. In so doing, the latter, lying on the ground or rather broken, which puts its owner out of the game for the time being. When all have thrown, the one who has come nearest the mark is the winner. Sometimes each contestant throws two or more stones, and sometimes sides are chosen. Large numbers of broken gaming stones can be found [175] near every old village site, confirming the statements of the older men and women concerning the universality of the sport

[1] Whether called iklia, a name said either to be derived from that of a fungus, or that the latter is derived from it.

526 in former times. Skiia might almost be called the Bella Coola [172] national game, although it is now (1923) seldom played.

A game with somewhat similar rules is nqulaiāk, played 526 with small wooden spears tipped with bone. When a number 525 of men or boys decide to play, they choose two captains who in turn select their teams; any number can take part, provided that the sides are equal, but five each is usual. There is a special name for each player according to his position, and he bets against the corresponding member of the other team. A mark is set up, and one of the captains throws his spear, so that it will stick upright in the ground as near the target as possible. The rival leader endeavours to beat this, and if he fails, his second man throws, and each in succession until one comes closer to the goal than the rival captain. Then the latter's number two tries to beat the last thrower, followed by those on his own side until one succeeds or till all have thrown. The game thus ends when all of one side have thrown unsuccessfully. The winning side is, of course, the one to which belongs the player whose throw is nearest the target. Each member of the losing team pays his wager to his adversary and a second round is begun.

The sport is now rarely indulged in, but in former times games used to continue all day, and valuables were lost in the gambling which was considered to be a necessary part of it. [785] Men used to observe ceremonial chastity to increase their [554] chances of success and the expert was regarded with admiration by younger lads. The crack team of a village often used to [628] visit other towns to compete against their representatives, and the games were contested amid frenzied excitement on the part of the supporters. This occasionally led to serious fighting. [578]

Another sport of a similar type is archery; a mark is set 526 up and each competitor tries to lodge his arrow as close to it as possible. This game has now entirely lost favour, the young men preferring a type of football played without strict attention to rules, but with great energy.

Bella Coola children, too, have their games and recreations, 857 many of them of an imitative nature. Little boys enjoy nothing become entangled in the loop when drawn back by the cord 526 attached to the butt. A tug-of-war now takes place, those of each party who have caught the ring endeavouring to pull it to their side of the water. At last one or other is successful, and brings ashore the prize, with the dangling spears of their adversaries. Sometimes a lad with a fine weapon determines to retain possession of it at all costs and is dragged through the pool to the amusement of all.

TOURNAMENTS

It is doubtful whether the subject of tournaments should 526 be considered as belonging to mythology, warfare, or games, 628 since it has aspects pertaining to each. Several of the older 926 men affirmed that prior to the introduction of muskets, it was not uncommon for rival villages to stage fights according to definite rules, after full intimation of the attack had been given. This usually followed a period when angry comments had been made, but when the provocation was not sufficient for war. In such a case, the challenging town would notify its rival that on such a date an expedition consisting of, for example, twenty canoes would attack them with stones. Such an announcement could not be disregarded; the inhabitants of the two settlements prepared for action and wagered the [525] large number of valuables essential to all such competitions.

Many years ago, the Kitsaquit people challenged the atáwq to a tournament of this kind. It was first necessary to choose the contestants. Twenty of the strongest men were selected, each to stand in the bow of a canoe and hold a moose-skin to shield the paddlers behind. To test their endurance, each took his place and the canoes were paddled towards the shore while all the other inhabitants, lined up on the beach, showered stones on them. On this first test, six of the twenty fell beneath the avalanche of projectiles and were astoundingly considered too feeble. Their places were taken by six others who were tested the same way the following day, and the same procedure was repeated until the twenty strongest men in all Kitsaquit had been found. A certain Sisaqaif was chosen as to him and takes him up to the sun, where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn out by the strong breeze blowing in the higher regions. He is quite naked, and bites everyone whom he can lay hold of. If he can not catch anyone he will bite his own arm. It is believed that he has lost his soul, which flutters from the body when the spirit came to him. Therefore the shamans must try for four days to recapture his soul. The night after they have recovered it the sisaul'a dances, clothed in a bearskin and wearing a large hand ring, heavy bracelets and anklets, all made of red cedar bark. Sometimes he appears wearing the mask of the Hamatsa (p. 200), the spirit which initiated him. This mask corresponds exactly to that of Dzelekwtlanx'kwat of the Kwakiutl. Some sisaul'a do not bite people, but merely devour one canoe or four dogs to pieces and devour them. Those who bite people (1) also devour canoes. The sisaul'a has to observe a number of regulations. For four years after his initiation he may not gamble. He must stay away from his father one year, but this period is being reduced to one month. For two or three months he must not leave his house.

Fig. 200.
Cat. No. 19000, U. S. N. M., collected by G. M. Dawson.

The o'lisa (the laughter) and the ts'ila (the crower) do not go into the woods to be initiated, it both must fast three days before their first dance. The o'lisa "makes fun of everything" and mocks people with his voice. The ts'ila carries straw and sticks and breaks household goods and canoes. If he has destroyed some object during the day, he pays for it at night when he dances. The o'lisa and ts'ila, after they have danced, must stay in their houses for one month.

If a person transgresses the laws of the tribal, for instance, when the sisaul'a gambles, or when a man performs a dance to which he has no right, also when a person destroys the canoe or makes a mistake in dancing, his punishment is death. The chiefs assemble in council and the offender is called before the court. After his offense has been proved, he is asked whether he is willing to suffer the penalty of death. If he is not willing and one of his relatives is found willing to take the penalty on himself, the guilty party is spared and the substitute killed in his stead. The execution of the judgment is intrusted to the shamans, who bewitches the condemned person by throwing disease into him or by poisoning him in some other (supernatural?) way. The object thrown by the shamans is a shell, bone, or finger nail, covered presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alt dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the nuxuk, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alt origin myths

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alt should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alt names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alt appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alt can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nuxwal for his name Sxwaiaitis which came to earth with Smanux (I, p. 331) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alt, Thelyakum, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sisnaxil (I, p. 328), who assumed the designation of Thelyakum after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'nisa.

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[1] long, long ago, Sqamtin came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sxwaxwa, and a mortal; so he perform several ancient rites through a desire to "show off" before someone who was ignorant. In recent years there has been a tendency to concentrate on kwiat ceremonials, and to judge a man's worth by his lavishness in them, but this is only a modern development due to the prohibition of the potlatch. Nevertheless, even in former times some individuals preferred to invite foreign guests to kwiat dances and to give them valuable gifts rather than to save these for potlatches; such a ceremony is called a kukwiatat. Whenever strangers are present at a kwiat dance they receive small pieces of dyed cedar-bark as proof of the friendly intentions of the host. The general consensus of Bella Coola opinion is that it is foolish for a man to concentrate on kwiat performances, particularly if he impoverish himself to the detriment of potlatches.

Although foreign guests are seldom invited to kwiat rites, a dancer frequently calls in his fellows from adjacent villages. But as the ceremonial season is simultaneous in the different settlements, with almost nightly performances, it is often impossible to avoid conflict in dates. Which invitation shall have preference is decided in the following manner:

During the days of qulim and nakwaw the dancer sends a herald of powerful physique to invite guests from as many villages as he wishes. Simultaneously, a messenger may be approaching from the opposite direction with a similar invitation. Each owner watches carefully around each bend in the path for his rival, and whichever can first call out his message is entitled to continue to give his invitation in the village of the outwitted herald. It is considered exceedingly bad taste to decline a summons, as the ceremony to which the defeated herald was bearing an invitation must be postponed. Sometimes the two messengers sight one another simultaneously, and the relative priority of their messages is then decided by a contest of strength. The rivals stand in the path, shoulder to shoulder, arms close to their sides, and shove with all their strength, the winner being the one who can force his opponent to move his feet. This last means of deciding is used exclu-

GAMES

517 19.1 [177] THE subject of games, lying on the border-line of social customs, was one which was not fully investigated. The Bella Coola, like all other peoples, have a number of sports and pastimes and although the old diversions are being forgotten by the younger people, many of the old men and women are familiar with those played in their youth. As isolated customs these may be of small value, but games of all kinds often preserve ancient practices and, as providing useful clues to the spread of peoples or of culture, are worthy of investigation. Unfortunately, lack of time made it impossible to give the subject the attention it deserved, and the few games here described must not be considered an exhaustive treatment of the subject.

528 [517] The favourite sedentary pastime, enjoyed equally by young and old, is the telling of stories. Those of a sacred nature, especially ancestral myths, are reserved of course for ceremonial occasions, but the older men and women remember [125] many tales describing the exploits of birds and animals which are recounted again and again to the enjoyment of the listeners, although they may have heard the same recital fifty times. Children enjoy the companionship of some old story-teller and it is a common sight to see an old man or woman, surrounded by an eager group, explaining once more how Raven outwitted his rivals or was himself led into difficulties. Many of these [167] stories are somewhat indecent; others appear brutally frank,

525 he is wrong, he pays them. It is said that in former times each stick used to be painted with a special device, and that each had its own name; even now they are beautifully made and highly polished by much passing from hand to hand. The Carriers [171] play the same game but use beaver teeth instead of sticks. Formerly it was not uncommon for a man to bet his goods, his wives and children, and even himself at this game. If he lost, [567] the persons so wagered became slaves of the victor unless [575] redeemed by their friends. Women, too, gambled freely; in fact, neophytes recently admitted into the kusiut society were the only ones to whom this pastime was forbidden.

526 Of actual games, the one most commonly played is skisa. As many as eight or ten contestants can take part, each providing himself with one, two, or three stones,[1] pecked down to the proper shape. Each is about six inches in length, three inches wide, flat on one side, and oval on the other, well rounded at either end. Before the coming of the white man, when the Bella Coola habitually used stone, it is said that one of these could be made in a few minutes. A mark is set up, and the first player throws his missile in the air, endeavouring to make it come to rest as close as possible to the target. The game is usually played on an open space near the village, but even on comparatively smooth ground there is great chance of bouncing and the thrower must gauge this possibility as well as have correct direction and distance. The second player likewise throws his stone, trying to land it nearer the target, or to knock away his rival's. In so doing, the latter, lying on the ground, is often broken, which puts its owner out of the game for the time being. When all have thrown, the one who has come nearest the mark is the winner. Sometimes each contestant throws two or more stones, and sometimes sides are chosen. Large numbers of broken gaming stones can be found [172] near every old village site, confirming the statements of the older men and women concerning the universality of the sport in former times. Sklsa might almost be called the Bella Coola national game, although it is now (1923) seldom played. 526 [172]

A game with somewhat similar rules is xqulaiāk, played with small wooden spears tipped with bone. When a number of men or boys decide to play, they choose two captains who in turn select their teams; any number can take part, provided that the sides are equal, but five each is usual. There is a special name for each player according to his position, and he bets against the corresponding member of the other team. A mark is set up, and one of the captains throws his spear, so that it will stick upright in the ground as near the target as possible. The rival leader endeavours to beat this, and if he fails, his second man throws, and each in succession until one comes closer to the goal than the rival captain. Then the latter's number two tries to beat the last thrower, followed by those on his own side until one succeeds or till all have thrown. The game thus ends when all of one side have thrown unsuccessfully. The winning side is, of course, the one to which belongs the player whose throw is nearest the target. Each member of the losing team pays his wager to his adversary and a second round is begun. 526 525

The sport is now rarely indulged in, but in former times games used to continue all day, and valuables were lost in the gambling which was considered to be a necessary part of it. Men used to observe ceremonial chastity to increase their chances of success and the expert was regarded with admiration by younger lads. The crack team of a village often used to visit other towns to compete against their representatives, and the games were contested amid frenzied excitement on the part of the supporters. This occasionally led to serious fighting. [785] [554] [628] [578]

Another sport of a similar type is archery; a mark is set up and each competitor tries to lodge his arrow as close to it as possible. This game has now entirely lost favour, the young men preferring a type of football played without strict attention to rules, but with great energy. 526

Bella Coola children, too, have their games and recreations, many of them of an imitative nature. Little boys enjoy nothing 857

[557] better than hunting birds and small animals with miniature bows and arrows, or snaring them in nooses of grass or string. Little girls make playhouses in which they cook wonderful meals of berries, with perhaps the addition of a wooden fish. On the whole, however, the children do not enter into play so boisterously as white boys and girls, nor do they seem to derive so much pleasure from it. In former times, when clothing was scanty, small lads used to delight in picking nettles and beating one another with the stinging branches; this must have caused considerable pain, but it was a point of honour not to cry out, and anyone, perhaps caught unaware, who showed discomfort, was laughed at as a coward. Both boys and girls are fond of swinging, and even adult women sometimes find time to enjoy themselves by swaying to and fro at the end of a rope.

Young Bella Coola do not have as many toys as white children, and none of them is complex. Some girls have crude wooden dolls, though elaborate figurines are reserved for use in Tsaiat dances. Perhaps the most cherished plaything is a small puppy or, in recent years, a kitten, though the unfortunate animal is handled and mauled without consideration. A good carpenter may make for his son a wooden top or a bull-roarer, to the envy of his less fortunate friends. Both types of toys are said to be used in Nuxmalt-a and at some Tsaiat dances the masked figures carry them to play with.

There is one game, chli, which the salmon are said to delight to watch, and which is accordingly played by boys as soon as the first spring salmon have been dropped off with fencing cries. Each makes for himself, or is given by his father, a wooden spear with a projecting barb, fastened as shown in the accompanying sketch (see Fig. 1). A loop of branches is made and thrown into a pool of stagnant, or slow-moving water, on each side of which stands a rival group of competitors. At a signal, all throw their spears simultaneously, with the intention of passing them through the ring, so that the barb of each will become entangled in the loop when drawn back by the cord attached to the hunt. A tug-of-war now takes place, those of each party who have caught the ring endeavouring to pull it to their side of the water. At last one or other is successful, and brings ashore the prize, with the dangling spoils of their adventure. Sometimes a lad with a fine weapon determines to retain possession of it at all costs and is dragged through the pool to the amusement of all.

It is doubtful whether the subject of tournaments should be considered as belonging to mythology, warfare, or games, since it has aspects pertaining to each. Several of the elders now affirmed that prior to the introduction of muskets, it was not uncommon for rival villages to stage fights according to definite rules, after full intimation of the attack had been given. This usually followed a period when angry comments had been made, but when the provocation was not sufficient for war. In such a case, the challenging town would notify its rival that on such a date an expedition consisting of, for example, twenty canoes would attack them with arrows. Such an announcement could not be disregarded; the inhabitants of the two settlements prepared for action and wagered the large number of valuables essential to all such competitions.

Many years ago, the Kimapiri people challenged the ariwa to a tournament of this kind. It was first necessary to choose the contestants. Twenty of the strongest men were selected, each to stand in the bow of a canoe and hold a mere-shield to shield the paddlers behind. To test their endurance, each took his place and the canoes were paddled towards the shore while all the other inhabitants, lined up on the beach, showered arrows on them. On this first test, six of the twenty fell beneath the avalanche of projectiles and were accordingly considered unfaithfully. Their places were taken by six others who were tested the same way the following day, and the same procedure was repeated until the twenty strongest men in all Kimapiri had been found. A certain Simapai was chosen as [illegible] capsule. Meanwhile the other people had been carrying out similar tests, so that the picked men of both settlements were ready on the appointed day.

A canoe was sent forward to give final notice of the approaching battle so that the twenty canoes from each settlement came together, fully manned and armed. Five canoes on each side came to Mewa, the captain of each craft singling out a bamboo and dealing with it alone. The crews then swam over and around their own bamboo, trying to beat down the mosquito-like bold of the other craft, or sometimes endeavouring to throw missiles high up into the air so as to the heads of their foes. Whenever a bamboo was knocked down, its crew was defeated and subject to serious injury if they continued the fight. If however, they abandoned the conflict, the winners made no effort to punish them further, nor did they join in as much as any other canoe; that each craft had one adversary only was the rule in all tournaments. In this instance, the Kimugui people were victorious, as has been eighteen of their canoes defeating the craft opposed to them. Kimugui returned home in triumph, singing his war-song, and was received with as much enthusiasm as if he had led a successful raid. Behind the conflicts, consisting chiefly of broken heads, were sometimes almost as serious as a fray, but no revenge was ever claimed in case of death or wound. Instead of throwing stones by hand, it was sometimes agreed that they were to be cast by slings which made the tournament more dangerous. The warriors wore all their canoes, so that hand-to-hand fighting was impossible.

It is probable that tournaments of this nature took place many years ago, although none of the men now living had ever participated in one, and many had never heard of the type of competition. Until relatively recent years, however, hoopy canoe-skins were held up as protections to the faces of canoes, and men were selected for the task of being paired with canoes in the manner just described.

One other type of game, using figures, was studied rather extensively. These are described in Appendix B.

their houses. Dishes, benches, cooking boxes, cradles, coffins, canoes, all were carved from the wood. The bark was woven into baskets, and when dyed formed the most common commercial decoration.

Even within the forty miles of the river valley formerly occupied by the Bella Coola there are considerable variations in climate. At the mouth of the river the typical Pacific coast type is found, without great extremes of temperature and with much rain, especially in winter time. During winter, the moisture is precipitated as snow a few hundred feet above the valley, and the limit of the snow can be marked on the mountain slopes, rising or falling a few feet from day to day. Farther up the valley, the winters are colder and in many cases snow lies for weeks on the ground, and in the upper part of the Bella Coola area the winters are severe, although much more moderate than on the upper regions immediately to the east.

When has been the history of the inhabitants of this land? They believe that long, long ago, Ayamtlin, the supreme god, caused their first ancestors to be created in his house, Nuxalk-a, in the land above, and sent them down to populate the Bella Coola valley. These first people came in groups of two or three, brothers and sisters, or occasionally men and wife, each group descending, in many cases in animal form, to a certain mountain and then making their home at its foot. They brought with them animals and fish, tools and houses, also the knowledge of ceremonial dances. In fact, they differed from the Bella Coola of the present past only in having greater supernatural power. These first people increased with extraordinary rapidity, until each group grew into a village, bound together by a knowledge of their first ancestors. In course of time the occupants of certain villages continued, or some increased more rapidly than others, but on the whole each settlement maintained its character of being the descendants of one group of the first settlers of this world.

This mythological belief is a fair picture of Bella Coola life as it was when the first white man visited the valley. Ther-of his relatives, has given them for this purpose. When he [575]* [illegible]

[illegible] him. Particularly in those dances fraught with [illegible] danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his [535] friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely stands up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. It is considered contrary to good manners for a father or [573] help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is planned to have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bahi Bahi [571] certain dancing have definite perspectives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bahi Coola. Throughout [535] every dance the dancing women were their dancing on.

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in the Lemon house saw. They hear the song, see, and gaze with [575]* eyes on X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight. [576]*
Then the sounding boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.* All the dancing now moves to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A hot [536] drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and when the song has been finished two men continue to rape to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend supervised the distribution of food, which follows his food [574] dancing. As the dancing are eating, the sounding delivers their usual admonishments, a rule that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back wall of the house. Whereas here have been planned to conclusion so that it is no easy matter to build a framework a few feet to height, of which the fire top is screened by a sparring wall about three feet high. This is often decorated [531] with designs of dried cedar bark, without visual significance so far as the Bahi Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the dancing disperses, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place.

nearest answer to the question replied that his crest was the Raven. The Kitkatla was a Raven man, too, and to the narrator's surprise, treated him as a brother for the rest of his stay in Victoria. He shook with laughter as he recalled the experience, and added that though he was quite willing to accept favours of this kind he would never dream of returning them. It can be stated unhesitatingly that the Bella Coola have no totemic beliefs concerning their crests. There is not the slightest trace of respect towards the animal, nor yet of exogamy.

Although crests are not objects of religious veneration, yet they have some importance in the realm of social life. The portrayal of one serves to indicate ownership of an accepted myth describing that particular bird or animal. A wealthy chief is proud to display his crest on a totem-pole, or on a painting on the front wall of his house. Anyone using such a design is impressed with the glories of the family history of the owner, to the latter's gratification. A living specimen of the bird or animal is treated with no respect, but its delineation is a memento of family history. For that reason a man is often tattooed* with his crest, that derived from his father's first ancestor on the right breast, that from his mother, on the left; and the owner of a canoe often carves his crest on its bow. After the death of a chief a memorial post is erected over his grave, decorated with a painting or carving of one or more crests to remind observers not only of the deceased, but of his family history, his most treasured possession. It is said, half

* It is said that tattooing was formerly customary not only among all the coastal tribes but also the Carrier. Both Bella Coola men and women decorated themselves in this way, but the custom was not universal, and it still seems to have been exceptional. It is believed that Bella Coola tattooed themselves in connection with puberties, as Bella Coola this was not the case although the operation was performed within the bath-room of the patient's house. Two methods were employed. The first was by puncturing the skin with a needle smeared with colouring material; the second and less common, by passing a string coated with the substance beneath the skin. The dye was obtained from river stones which were baked for a long time and then ground into a powder. This bought indelibility and was by much easier for one by mixing with water. As far as could be learned, any skilled craftsman might perform the operation.

614 The outcome of this process of loss is the assimilation to 553 an origin myth of names originally brought into the ancestral 178 family by a woman from abroad. Unless intercourse and 973 friendly relations were maintained by "return marriages," in a few generations no tradition would be remembered to account for the name, and this, if used at all, would be interwoven into the well-known ancestral myth. Hence a myth is not static with regard to the names embodied in it. These change from generation to generation; it is probable that elements of the story itself suffer like additions and alterations, even though the people do not consider this to be the case.

611 The Bella Coola regard the ancestral family as a social unit, 614 not only in terms of the present, but as stretching back to the long settlement of the earth. Viewed from this angle, it is in fact, though not admitted to be so by the Bella Coola, a sociol grouping with patrilineal descent, which may, in both the most recent and most ancient generations, be marked by matrilineal descent instead. A man frequently uses prerogatives obtained through his mother, her mother, or even her mother's mother, but it is tacitly assumed that for many previous generations such rights passed in the patrilineal line.
Sometimes this succession extended back to the beginning of time; in other cases, prerogatives were transmitted matrilineally for a considerable period after the settlement of the earth, before gradually becoming patrilineal.

614 It has been thus far assumed that the only prerogative
424 wrapped up in an ancestral name is a knowledge of the myth 551 in which it is embodied. But there are others. For example, several of the first inhabitants of the world are said to have carried totem-poles, each of which was displayed by its owner at the gathering where he took for himself a name. Thereafter, the only person entitled to use that particular totem-[552] pole design was the person with the legal right to the name in [553] question. The same principle governs all dance names; each entitles its owner to perform a certain ceremonial. Thus it is possible to enlarge the previous definition by saying that:

chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as one for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for her (see I, p. 400). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women still, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their owners. Most names given to children, though embedded in origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into disuse through failure to give potlatches.

With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn between chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a man's influence in the community has become so great that he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

On the material seat are carved the man's ancestral crests, in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and to these, therefore, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of moral superiority, as if strength there is such dread of the supernatural powers possessed by members of the Secret society that none would dare go there. If an uninitiated person should do so, he would formerly have been either killed or initiated into the society. The meeting-place of the Dzonqo-o chiefs is on a ledge of rock jutting out over a waterfall about a quarter of a mile from the village. The stream winds down a narrow cleft of the mountain side, screened by dense vegetation, and suddenly falls into a cauldron, so hemmed in by cliffs that no sunlight can come. The ledge is immediately above the brink of the falls, one of the most awe-inspiring places imaginable. The meeting-places of other villages lack such natural settings, though all are at the bases of cliffs, or near some easily distinguished feature. Some of them are decorated with rude carvings, pecked into the stone. The meaning of the designs is not known to any of the present inhabitants. Some of them were made, long ago, by chiefs when they were composing songs; they picked out the rock in time to the music forming in their minds. Others were mere memorials of certain events. If a chief gave an important ceremony, he, or one of his friends, carved a figure, perhaps that of a man, perhaps of some animal connected with the rite, to recall the occasion. No carvings have been made within the life-time of any Bella Coola, so it is probable that they had further significance, now unknown.

When a chief wishes to summon his fellows for a meeting he visits each and notifies him by a simple pressure of the foot, in many cases unobserved even by those sitting near. The person so called slips away, unnoticeably, to the meeting-place.

The position of chief was not without disadvantages in the old days. The Bella Coola are so jealous that anyone who succeeded in elevating himself to a position above his fellows became an object of envy. Their mythology contains many examples of the murder of some powerful chief by rivals of his own village, and informants of today state that these records are true. One intelligent man asserted that his father had

Presently the guests assemble, those who are nuxul wearing on their heads one or more wooden skins as a mark of membership in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled, the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners, slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

A number of young ladies, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

[599]

A man may receive as many prerogatives with regard to house painting that he has to continue the designs on the sides of his dwelling, or he may receive as many figures for a totem-pole that he can erect one of composite pattern. X may acquire prerogatives not only from his father-in-law, but from his mother-in-law, and if he is the husband of several wives, the family of each may contribute something. If, for some inexplicable reason, X is not given any prerogative from the family of his wife, he uses one of his own ancestral myths with the names belonging thereto. A man who gives many potlatches can choose to validate numerous family names for himself, or to concentrate on one alone, elevating it to a position of great importance. But any names he validates must belong to his [685] family; it is contrary to custom for a Bella Coola to steal a name to which he has no right.

At this, or some other suitable time, X prays for assistance in the complicated rites that are to follow. Taking four pieces of pounded and dyed cedar-bark, and four pieces of undyed bark, he places on each a small quantity of food and throws the eight into the fire. Likewise he may throw in four small pieces of any kind of goods. As he does so he appeals to the supreme god:

"Please strengthen my spirit for the many duties which are before me."

Instead of praying himself, X may ask a shaman to do so for him, in the belief that the latter's supplication will be more efficacious. [754]

The necessity for supernatural assistance lies in the fact that any serious error or disaster in the performance of potlatch rites calls for necessary punishment, since X has allowed sacrilegious sacred knowledge to reach the uninitiated. In such a case the duty of meting out a penalty falls upon the members of a foreign tribe. Nothing is said at the time, but the departing guests take away with them information of what has happened. Great latitude is allowed as to who shall be the chastisers. The guests may be related to X and the members of his village, hence they will not feel it incumbent upon them to intervene. But news travels, and in course of time the armed members of some other tribe will decide to send a raiding party against X's village. All informants agreed most emphatically that this custom prevailed among the coast people from the Tsimshian country to Alert Bay, but specific examples could not be obtained. The Bella Coola regard such a raid as the proper course to pursue, and belligerent tribes may have used an irregularity in the potlatch rites as an excuse for an assault. It is clear, however, that this custom never attained such prominence that it could be called a law.

The following is an instance of the Bella Coola outlook on the question:

The father of an informant had had such success in giving potlatches that his neighbours were jealous. On one occasion he prepared a representation of a whale, an elaborate wooden frame, fifteen feet long, operated by men concealed within and carrying paddles; this was a figure which entered into his ancestral myth. One of the carpenters who made it, bribed by a jealous rival of the donor of the potlatch, arranged that the lower jaw of the whale should fall to the floor during the proceedings. This revealed the mechanism of the structure. White influence on the coast prevented an invasion of foreign raiders, but according to this informant, the chiefs determined that his father should die, and they employed a sorcerer for this purpose. His father and eleven other relatives died soon afterwards. This man, the sole survivor, ascribes his escape to his adoption of Christianity.

[378] [542] [578] [177] [754]

Another instance of the penalty which follows errors in potlatch ritual occurred a few years ago, when a number of young men used the ceremonial whistles openly, as if they had been toys. The presence of the white man prevented any open steps towards punishment, but before long all the youths died. No one knows what caused their deaths, though probably they were due to an expert in black magic acting on the instructions of a senior chief.

[594] [177] [754]

After the prayer, X and his family give more food to their guests, whose boxes containing what they are to carry away are increasing in number. By his lavishness, X increases his prestige in the eyes of his fellow-villagers.

533 This is presently heard. Y may be in his own house, but at 556 once any number of xaaxi rush in and conduct him, concealed 575 in their midst, to the back-room of X's dwelling. All the xaaxi of the village begin to gather there; those who are not members of the society are also free to enter the main part of the house, though they cannot take any part in the proceedings.
[781] They lurk near the door, watching with interest mixed with fear, and ready to flee if the danger from supernatural beings seems too acute.

After some delay, a whistle is heard at intervals, gradually becoming louder as if the supernatural being, of which it is the voice, were coming nearer. Presently it sounds immediately outside the door, and a xiki rushes forth. He returns in a moment, followed, amid the breathless excitement of the uninitiated, by a figure masked as a bird or animal. The design [572] represents Y's crest, or some creature with which one of his ancestors came in contact, and which is therefore regarded as having the same sociological importance. A member of the society has carved the mask, another wears it, but this the uninitiated do not know.

[776] "It is a xaxiwam,"* they gasp.

The figure crosses the house and bends down beside the singers to whom it appears to be whispering. Presently they begin, softly, to tap out a song in rapid time as if the supernatural visitor had just taught it to them. It is divided into two or three parts and the theme is taken from Y's ancestral myth. After two or three rehearsals, the singers beat out the time more loudly and accompany it with their voices, while [535] the masked figure dances. A number of older xaaxi accompany the performer as he whirls around the house; it is pretended that this is necessary to shield the spectators, though the real function is to guide the dancer whose sight is handi-

If the neophyte is a son or other near relative of the chief who is giving the potlatch, the dance may consist of bestowing references to the goods about to be distributed. This is necessary for X himself if he performs as a xaaxi at the actual ceremony.

556 adopted, probably as a prerogative obtained through mar-
575 riage, from the Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people. The diver-
177 sity in ritual supports this view. There was not sufficient [796] time for the procedure to become stabilized between the introduction of the concept and the dislocation of Bella Coola social life through the influence of the white man. It is also possible that the tatwinam was added to sisaek rites from the older a'alt society (I, p. 273).

532 Whatever may have been the history of the tatwinam, it 536 provides Y with a mask, or with two, if two figures have ap-575 peared. He guards them jealously, though secretly, throughout his life and uses them only on rare ceremonial occasions.
[969] It is one of these masks which will be brought out if one of his family gives a dramatic representation of his return after death.
[428] A mask of this type is sometimes willed, but the legatee alters the design before using it.

556 A short pause follows the singing of the second, or third, 575 song, during which some chief or chiefs may make a laudatory speech concerning Y's family history. Then the singers again [537] sing the first song, and sisaek members of the audience join in.
[533] Similarly, the second song is practised. These two are sung, time after time, until the sisaek have thoroughly mastered them. When the singers consider that this has been accomplished, they tell X, who communicates with the sisaek man outside who has the whistle, and again its eerie notes are heard.
[981] Some of the uninitiated, believing that the supernatural being who gives potency to the ritual is at hand, hurriedly leave in fear. At the same time some of the sisaek conduct to the back-room the second initiate whose songs are to be sung that night. The procedure in his case is identical with that described for Y. Usually it is considered sufficient to seclude two on one night, though three may be attempted. When the songs of the last have been sung, food is distributed and the people disperse.

A few nights later the same ritual is repeated for two more initiates, who join their predecessors in the back-room. Here they spend their time in idleness, the only essential being the 535 of the head-dress hang weasel skins. In Bella Bella it is said to be customary for a skin to be added on every occasion when a * 556 susask is confined to the back-room. This may happen as many 575 as fifteen times to the child of wealthy parents, and a few Bella

Coola have adopted the practice of marking each with a skin.
[237] Usually, some six or nine are hung in two tiers, without consideration of the number of times the wearer has been in seclusion. The central figure of the forehead mask is a head with • [532] a hooked nose, the recurved hook being joined to the face itself. This figure does not vary with the wearer's ancestral myth, and no one knows what it represents. This design is [177] said to have been introduced to Bella Coola from the north a few generations ago; before that time the head-dress consisted [237] of a circular band of dyed cedar-bark, decorated with the tail
[824] feathers of one of the large woodpeckers. The Bella Coola call it simply, "forehead mask." Each initiate carries a hollow
[532] rattle, carved in the shape of a bird, which he holds in his right
[534] hand, belly uppermost. Long, long ago, when a dancer failed to do so, the rattle became alive and the bird flew away; hence, this rule has been obeyed ever since.

535 Each initiate takes up his station in some part of the house behind the fire and dances to the beating of the sticks. The
* 556 left hand of each is clasped behind his back and in his right he 575 holds the rattle and keeps it in constant motion by shaking his wrist. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a good dancer. Keeping the body stiff and the legs close together, he rises with slight jumps, barely altering his position on the floor. Sometimes he slowly turns around sunwise[11] in his series of jumps, at other times he does not alter his position. The head is bent from side to side and downwards at each jump, causing the eagle down to fly in all directions. Susask assistants blow more of the material on to the head-dress at intervals (see Plate 16).[1]

[821] [11] The Bella Coola believe that the sun moves from east to south to west to [796] north. Many ceremonial movements follow this direction, which will henceforth be described as sunwise.

203 that he wants so-and-so, giving the name of a chief, to go, for 556 instance, to Bella Bella, to invite a certain person, whose name 484 he gives, to the potlatch. X likewise names those whom he [575] wishes to form the escort. As a nusak whistle is used, it is essential either that the chief himself be a senior nusak, or that a sikt go with him. It is immaterial whether or not all of the crew are members of the society. Nobody is compelled to go, but as all know it will be a matter of pride to X to recompense them, none declines except for some strong reason. X names those whom he wishes to proceed to other tribes, sending one canoe to each group of towns. He arranges their departure according to the distance each must travel, the aim being to have all the guests arrive at Bella Coola at the same time.
X is expected to provide food for his guests as soon as they arrive, and as the potlatch cannot start until all have assem-[648] bled, X tries to ensure simultaneous arrival, no easy matter since the area from which guests are invited extends from the Nass River to Alert Bay.

The mysterious and sacred nature of the potlatch is impressed on the minds of the uninitiated at the time of departure. When the chief who is to bear the invitation, and the members of the crew are ready in the canoe at the beach, there is heard from X's house the sound of a whistle. The uninitiated, unaware of the method by which the noise is produced, consider it to be the voice of some supernatural being connected with the potlatch. Either the messenger himself, or some assistant with him, blows a whistle. This can be done without exposing the method by putting the whistle to the lips under cover of a large blanket. When this has sounded the canoe is free to proceed.

The messenger-chief carries with him his nusak mask, which he dons if he sees another canoe approaching, while

grease have been placed in readiness. X selects as many 556* youths as the number on whom he intends to confer the names 575 which have already been announced and validated among the 553
Bella Coola, but are now to be made known to the foreign guests. He seats the lads, who are to substitute for the initiates, on the various boxes. Everybody understands that these are merely representatives. X requests two chiefs to act as his announcers, choosing two with good voices and abundant self-confidence. To one of these X whispers the usual name of one of the initiates.

"His name is now——" calls out the announcer, pointing to one of the substitutes, and the listeners readily recognize the initiate intended, from the use, in conjunction with his new designation, of his well-known ancestral name. The heralds repeat the new name with the usual badinage, so that it becomes well known to all present. In like manner the usual name given to each initiate is publicly announced. The substitutes receive no advantage from their part in the proceedings. [203]

Then the boxes are opened and red elderberries poured into 556*
the canoes in front of the guests. Stones are provided with 264 which the visitors pound the fruit into pulp which they proceed to mix with their hands, as eulachon grease and cranberries [252] are added. Then X's helpers distribute spoons and the feast commences. All start to eat, but after an interval one of the leading Bella Coola chiefs strikes the side of his canoe with a spoon, as a signal that all must stop. X has several dishes in [415] readiness. If he is wealthy some of these will be carved in the [532] shape of beaver, eagle, or other form in which an ancestor appeared. These dishes are filled with the food which all have been eating and then placed before the principal chiefs, who thus have a second supply. At this point the singers begin to 533 beat out an ancient song of the type known as ne-ula. Each 556* of these has been handed down from the distant past, when some chief, ancestor of X, had it composed for himself at a potlatch. The theme is always about the form or fame of his [171]

[illegible] ceremonial occasions, and the text is commonly grandiloquently phrased.* Frequently the singers alter the words slightly to suit the occasion, and sometimes compose entirely new words for an old tune. As they sing, they are aided by some of X's friends who rise and stand between the fire and the front door. They occasionally wear forehead masks carved with his crest to add dignity to the rite.

After the song the chiefs continue their meal, and there is much practical joking with the heralds.

"Don't you want some food?" X calls to one of them.

Without waiting for an answer he throws a box containing the liquid pulp, inclined at such an angle that the mass is spread over the recipient. Occasionally, a herald will succeed in catching a box without spilling the contents, but usually he is smeared from head to foot, while the spectators shriek with laughter. It is one of the functions of a herald to be a laughing stock for the visitors.

During the afternoon X's wife and the members of her family deliver to him the goods which they have amassed to "re-buy" her from her husband. These are called "washing material," as if they supplied X with wash-basin and toilet accessories. The speaker states how the wife has lived up to her obligation in making this presentation, and how it will clear the path for her children. These goods will later on be distributed by X. They can be used for:

(1) Repayment of potlatch debts, or

(2) Making potlatch investments, or

(3) Validating names, either usual or ancestral, for the children of his relatives.

It would be most disgraceful should any of the goods be applied to validating usual names for any of X's own children, because they have come from his wife's people and react to the advantage of her children in any case. These goods are

*Though not to the same extent as among the Kwakiutl where the words may describe how the sky is supported on a chief's shoulders, or how he has pushed his head into the land above.

556 184 ings to reward carpenters and others who had helped X prepare for his potlatch, but in Bella Coola this was usually done the following night.

556 769 595 575 [598] How comes what the Bella Coola regard as the most important feature of the potlatch.* The singers strike up one of the songs of a senior nuxalk, perhaps a ulki chosen for his skill in acting. As he dances, clad in his ceremonial costume and head-dress, whistling is heard without the house. A number of nuxalk are making the noise and they modulate it so that it appears to draw nearer and nearer. This is effected either with whistles of different sizes or by blowing harder. The dancer rushes out of the house. The whistling continues in a series of short bursts, as if a conversation were being carried on in that language. The nuxalk or ulki returns, and the audience, astonished by the mystery of the affair, listens to his explanation:

"It is so-and-so," he announces, using the ancestral name of one of X's deceased relatives. "The crest has come to pay his son [or whatever relation X may be to him] a visit. I will bring him in."

While he speaks, continuous whistling is heard from without, but when he leaves the house it once more takes on the form of a dialogue. Presently he returns, followed by a masked figure in the centre of a group of members of the nuxalk society. If the deceased's first ancestor had been an eagle, in that guise [532] the figure will appear—an eagle mask on his head, and his whole body, except perhaps the feet, covered by a large blanket thickly covered with eagle down and furnished with painted wooden wings. The dancer is usually entirely blinded by this costume, but he is guided by a number of the nuxalk whose presence is attributed to the necessity for guarding and paying honour to the supernatural visitor. Among those who accompany him there is always a man with a whistle, the note of [533] which simulates the cry of an eagle, and this is sounded at intervals. The actor bends in imitation of a bird and shakes [532] himself, lifting his head and opening the movable beak by

*Though potlatches can be held without this feature.

[illegible] of a killer whale, while the whistle sounds. Then he stoops down and hops a few steps eagle fashion. Slowly, with pauses and turnings around, the figure circles the fire and retires through the front door, always accompanied by a number of sonnet. The actor displays considerable dramatic ability, and the performance is striking effective in the large, plank-built house, illuminated only by a smoky central fire which casts flickering shadows over the intently watching audience. The dogs, alone unimpressed by the solemnity of the occasion, skulk to and fro.

If a whale is represented, a large wooden frame-work is carried by several men who walk inside of it. Ravens, bear, or other animals may also be used, according to the ancestral myth of the deceased. Some of the first people came to this earth as men, but there have always been a sufficient number of intermarriages to permit everyone to portray some bird or beast, obtained from the family into which an ancestor married. A supernatural object claimed to have been seen by a forefather can also be used on these occasions. In some cases a composite figure is used. Such may have the head of an eagle, a killer whale projecting from the back, and a raven on its chest. In such a case these three creatures have been connected with the ancestry of the deceased, and his spirit is believed to have assumed these forms. Great individual choice is allowed in such matters.

If several of X's deceased relatives are being commemorated, the sound of whistling is again heard from without, a short time after the departure of the first masked figure. A senior naxnit goes out, and the same ritual is repeated. This time the masked actor represents some other bird or animal. Three, or in some cases four, dead people are thus shown, though one is more customary. The actual management of the figures is left to the direction of the carpenters who have made them. Often a foreign workman is employed, as a mark of respect for his skill. In spite of all precautions there are often delays about the final preparations, especially with regard

* 532 465 skill shown by those who assisted, as well as the generosity of X, equalizes the disbursements.

The following presents of money were given at a potlatch held about 1890, and were considered considerable.

For painting two designs[a] on the front outside wall of the house	$ 40.00
For the erection of four upright posts, supporting the walls and roof of the house	50.00
For each longitudinal beam with painting	50.00
For each cross-beam, without painting	25.00
For the plastering of the side walls[b]	100.00
For painting the rear wall of house, which is also the outside wall of the back room[c]	40.00

426 *556 The next distribution is of goods to repay debts which X has incurred at previous potlatches, that is, to return "investment presents" then received (I, p. 235). This is known as kudjat, "repay," and the word is applied to all kinds of repayments, including revenge. One of a chief's difficulties is to remember his indebtedness. He may have been a guest at twenty potlatches, and at each has received presents varying in value, not only from different donors, but from other people associated with them. To keep these accurately in mind is hard but essential, and parents carefully train their children to do so.

[867] As previously mentioned, the Bella Coola have no fixed scale of interest on debts. Careful inquiries made on that point disclosed the idea to be entirely foreign. The greater the interest, the greater does the donor show himself to be. If, for example, X received an investment present of one hundred blankets from a Bella Bella chief ten years previously,

[532] [342] [a]When two are painted, that on the left of the central door on entering passways X's father's crest, that on the right his mother's.

[b]Four men would work together on this task.

[c]Two men would work together at this, the choice of designs corresponding to those of the outside front.

[illegible], clad in his ceremonial costume, including a long cape with pockets. With him come the four or five young men who have just finished dancing. The singers have since furiously with their sticks, and the ulu which round and round, working himself into a frenzy with verve and gyrations. Gradually, he approaches one of the initiates, and proceeds to pluck something from his body. As he opens his hands the spectators see that there is something in them, what exactly, they cannot distinguish. Only those who are nanal understand that, whatever it is, it has been pulled from one of his cape pockets. He proceeds to throw this object upwards, as the same time slipping it back into his cape. As the article is, theoretically, thrown aloft the sound of whistling is heard, which grows weaker and weaker till it finally ceases. Meanwhile the hamlets discourse loudly with one another about how the "eagle" or whatever it is, has been extracted, and is now returning above. The same procedure is repeated for the other initiates. This concludes the night's ceremony. Food is distributed and the people disperse.

The employment of a foreign ulu to expel the power from the initiates is necessary since this particular prerogative is not native to Bulla Coola. Formerly the expulsion was done in the back-room without any elaborate ceremony. This rite marks the admission of initiates into the nanal society although they cannot yet leave the back-room. It must be understood, however, that a youth may be initiated several times, on each occasion receiving new songs and perhaps a different mask. In this way his prestige as a nanal is increased, and the son of a powerful chief will often be initiated ten or more times. A mask so acquired is preserved in concealment as the personal property of the owner who may use it at pleasure on future occasions. It will be the guise in which a dead person returns to visit the living. After being used for this purpose, a mask may be burnt, or willed to a near relative of the deceased, who slightly alters the painting before using it himself.

It is somewhat difficult to understand the attitude of those

Totem-Poles

A feature embodied in many ancestral myths is a description of the totem-pole erected by a group of the first people, either according to a design given them by Mountain, or in consequence of their experiences on this earth. It is the privilege of a chief descended from that group to erect such a pole, under the same restrictions as apply to the portrayal and use of other features belonging, not to him individually, but to the ancestral family as a whole. Totem-poles are also frequently erected to depict incidents connected with the ancestors of a chief, even if there is no mention of one in his ancestral myth. In either case, the setting-up is a source of pride to the chief, especially as it emphasizes the importance of his ancestors, and its dignity must be duly validated. Theoretically, this may be done at a gathering of less importance than a potlatch, but in practice it occurs at no other ceremony, since a chief wealthy enough to erect a pole naturally desires it to be seen by as many persons as possible.

Poverty limits the number of totem-poles, but is not sufficient to account for their relative rarity. It is a matter of pride for a chief in whose ancestral myth there is mention of a pole to erect one, but all myths do not include totem-poles. Consequently the absence of one before the door of the chief's house is not proof of the owner's poverty or lack of importance. This matter was investigated with great care, and all the older people reiterated that the number and size of their poles were never as great as among the northern tribes.

When a chief is preparing for a potlatch, he allots, among other carpentry tasks, the construction of a totem-pole, if he is sufficiently wealthy to reward the artisan and to validate the erection in the customary manner. If a special design is embodied in the ancestral myth containing the name which he is about to assume, or to make among, he indicates that design to the carpenter. In the story of Aitwi (I, p. 312), for

[Adzaxid, "Outside Poet."]

211 example, there is a description of his totem-pole with a bell 556 at the top, and beneath it an eagle's nest containing two fledg-778 lings towards which a grizzly bear is endeavouring to climb.
532 This is the only known instance of a pole on which the different figures stand in definite relationship to one another. No explanation is offered beyond the statement that this was the form used by Alkwi in the beginning of time. Another ancient pole, used by one of the ancestral families of Sawd, consists of [778] a simple shaft surmounted by a sphere; this represents a mountain which enters into their ancestral myth as supporting the sky.

As with all features embodied in ancestral myths, a chief can use his own discretion in cases where he has a choice of design. A totem-pole with specific figures is a common pre-[431] sent from a chief to his son-in-law, and it is a mark of respect [622] for the latter to use and validate this at the first opportunity, [604] in preference to one belonging to his own ancestral family. Since the pole erected at a potlatch may have no association with the ancestral name and myth of the donor, the underlying principle in all cases is that the value of the pole depends upon the quantity of gifts distributed to validate its erection. One man mentioned an instance in which he had become confused with regard to the proper design for the totem-pole connected with his ancestral myth, and had used one belonging to a second myth in association with a name from the first. Both were his property, the transaction was duly validated, and the matter passed off without question. It is possible that the [183] decay of custom which has followed the coming of the white man may have been partly responsible for this error, which was regarded as a somewhat stupid, though not improper mistake; yet it is clear that even when designs are remembered as portions of ancestral myths, they can be alienated from them and validated as isolated objects in the same manner as names and all other features of ancestral myths.

More often, the exact details of a pole are not included in the ancestral myth and a chief wishing to have one erected can one his own discretion as to the design. At the top he always places the bird or animal cloak in which his first ancestor, treated parallelously, came to this earth. Beneath this is the cloak of his mother's first ancestor if it differs from his father's. There are no fixed rules for other representations. Sometimes a man wishes to display the cloaks of the first ancestors of his wife, or wives; more often, the designs are of creatures with which his own ancestors came in contact after reaching this earth.[1] One of the first settlers, Swanson (I, p. 330), married a Haida Haida woman from whom he obtained a ceremony concerned with a whale, an animal which has often been used on the totem-poles of his descendants. The lower figures on totem-poles often represent creatures from which a recent ancestor of the chief obtained supernatural assistance. Consequently, the number of designs which may be used is legion, and the order of portrayal is immaterial. Moreover, Haida Coola art is not sufficiently realistic for designs to be easily recognized, nor is there standard conventionalization of little used animals; so it follows that the designs on totem-poles are often unidentifiable.[2] This is of little consequence, since their value rests neither upon the artistic skill exhibited, nor even upon their significance in connection with the owner's ancestral myth, but upon the goods expended to validate the display.

[illegible]

All Haida Coola totem-poles are carved from the trunks of huge cedars, with the wood cut away so that the designs stand out in high relief. The carvers are allowed great latitude both in choice of form and colouring, hence there is wide variation

[1] Amaamalis is the term applied to animals with which ancestors came in contact, other than their cloaks.

[2] This statement represents the layman's point of view, that is, of the Haida Coola who was not himself a carpenter-sculptor. It is probable that an expert would have greater facility in recognizing the conventionalized forms used by his ancestors, although the whole pattern of Haida Coola culture was opposed to extreme standardization. Unfortunately, wood-carving, in fact art work of every kind, had degenerated to such an extent that only one man with any recognized skill in that respect was still living when this study was made. He was both unreliable and uncooperative, so that it was impossible even to collect examples of his work, still less to record his interpretations of the designs of masks or other objects carved by his predecessors.

211 in the appearance of the poles. Sometimes one is erected at 556 the front door of the house with an opening at its base through 998 which all must pass to enter the house, or a pole may be added 532 and stand on the opposite side of the sidewalk; the choice in [184] either case depending upon the usage recorded in the ancestral myth. Instead of a totem-pole, a chief may display his ancestral crests by means of paintings on the front wall of his house, or by carved house-posts supporting the longitudinal beams, if such had been used by his ancestors. Moreover, a chief entitled to display a totem-pole may choose to use only paintings. If he validates these by presents, they give him the same dignity and importance as a totem-pole, particularly if he cannot validate its construction by lavish gifts. Most Bella Coola poles are only about fifteen to twenty feet in height, and though [171] it is possible that a few families had prerogatives entitling them to construct lofty poles, such as used by the Haida, it is unlikely that such were ever common.

When a chief who has erected a totem-pole before his house gives another potlatch, he may wish to put up a second pole beside the first. Occasionally two or three poles stand before the house of a chief, but one is more frequent or even none at [164] all. At death the pole is often taken to the cemetery where it acts as a memorial-post (I, p. 461). Otherwise it remains standing until some other occupant of the house wishes to erect another in its place, when the first is pulled down and neglected.

Coppers

556 The Bella Coola use coppers for only two purposes: casting [169] on the ground upon which the representation of a deceased relative had trodden, or throwing into the fire when the figure has left the house. In either case, they are said to "make bone for the dead." Although used but rarely, the occasion when a copper is employed is so important that to obtain one and increase its value is a vital consideration for every chief.

[177] Most of the coppers now used by the Bella Coola are made

chief to pay somewhat heavily, since the value of the copper depends on the amount expended on it.

The $20 received by the poor man must not be casually spent. He is expected to invite the whole village to his house, otherwise he would never again be given a copper. The heralds call everyone to the house, the singers as usual being the first to arrive. They beat out the hactsa song of anyone, to which the owner dances; the songs are used one after another, until almost every member of the society has danced. Sound songs may then be used in the same way. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the rite has no religious significance; it is merely a social affair. At the close of the dancing, the poor man distributes food to all, equivalent in value to the money received. It is probable that poor men sometimes give away slightly less than they have received, although any noticeable laxity in this would be punished by the receipt of no further coppers. The recipient of a copper from a fire derives no direct gain from it, though it is to his indirect advantage, since a person who has given away food is likely to receive larger presents on future occasions than one who has not.

Meanwhile the chief owning the copper is unable to use it at his potlatch since the value, dependent on the goods expended for it, is only $10, a sum so small that to use it would be insulting to his dead ancestor. There are several ways of increasing its value:

(1) By Painting. Taking advantage of some ceremony when a number of people are present, the owner gives a carpenter $10, for example, with a request that he paint on his copper a representation of the crest used by his, the owner's, first ancestor, when coming to this earth. Henceforth the value of the copper is $30.

(2) By Naming. The Bella Coola say that among the Kwakiutl names are given to almost all coppers; in Bella Coola it is a rare practice. Occasionally, a chief creates a name for his copper and validates this by presents to all the 435 immediately before, or during the early stages of a potlatch, in #556 order to receive goods immediately, but with the proviso that it shall be returned to him for throwing into the fire. This [422] method has the advantage of providing the chief with goods [416] when required, and doubles the worth of the copper.

Coppers are not always removed from the ashes and given to poor men. If one is still lying in the fire after several days, the donor of the potlatch removes it and forms it to the [764] memorial post over the grave of his deceased relative. It may be left there, or another chief wanting a copper may buy it from the donor and increase its value in the usual manner. Only a small price is paid in such circumstances, since the copper, having served its purpose, is practically valueless.

177 The Bella Coola state that in ancient times coppers were 435 worth less than at present, and that the change in sentiment
#556 regarding them is due to Kwakiutl influence. All agree that the value placed upon them at Fort Rupert and Alert Bay is greater than elsewhere on the coast. The Bella Coola believe that the Kwakiutl distribute presents in respect to their coppers and that their values mount to enormous sums when the gifts are returned. It is clear that the importance of coppers, like the potlatch and other elements of culture, has increased in recent years through the influence of the coastal tribes.

#556 It is almost impossible to define coppers in the nomenclature of economic theory. They are not mere articles of barter, since they have no practical use outside the ceremonies of chiefs. Nor are they standardized units of trade or cur-
[436] rency, since each differs not only from all other coppers, but 211 also at different periods. In a sense they serve as tokens of #532 what has been expended; representations of them may be carved and painted on totem-poles where they serve as marks of the goods which the chief has given away, but this is only
[426] a minor consideration. A copper can perhaps best be described [435] as an investment which can be applied only to one purpose, "the making of bone for a deceased" person. It grows more valuable at every transmission in accordance with the goods exponded, so that it serves as a visible and tangible memorandum of the chief-like generosity of its owner. By means of these media, debts are passed from one individual to another without actual liquidation in goods; in fact, it is unlikely that the Bella Coola possess sufficient money to meet the sums represented by their coppers.

Professional Prerogatives

The importance of prerogatives in the lives of the Bella Coola has already been noted in many connections. A man's name is his only because his ancestral family has the prerogative of using that designation; a hamat dance can be performed only by an individual with the necessary prerogative; specific totem-pole designs, the portrayal of bird or animal on spoons, seats, house-posts, and other objects is a right dependent upon an ancestral prerogative; as is also the area on which a man can hunt or fish. The concept colours all Bella Coola life. Not only is a man's ceremonial life based on this principle, but on it depend his actions as chief, and the economic sources of his food-supply. No prerogative, even though it be the property of a man, is effective until validated by the distribution of presents. Much of a man's energy throughout life is expended on the validation and display of his prerogatives; most Bella Coola feuds are caused by the infringement of one individual on another's rights.

556*

In addition to the various types already mentioned, there are a number of professional prerogatives on which depend a man's vocation. That of herald approximates this class, although the Bella Coola consider it rather as a right operative only during ceremonials. Professional prerogatives rest on the belief that a man's ability as a hunter, wood-worker, and so forth does not rest in his innate skill, but upon an inherited right which must be confirmed and validated by the distribution of presents. These can be given at any convenient time when the people have been called together, but, as it is to the man's advantage to have his right made known as widely quit. Details of this prerogative were not obtainable, but it seems to follow the general type. 424 769 463

THE PROFESSION OF FIRST BERRY PICKER

All women can pick berries, but in every village there is at least one who has the prerogative of picking the first of every kind. The origin of this right is lost in dim antiquity, but, like all others, each first berry picker has a special professional name embodied in her ancestral myth which must be duly validated before she can function. One of these is Sîtowayuk-nimûn-a, another is ła'yo. Though normally reserved for women, one of these names is occasionally given to a male child, in which case it is said to have been hermaphroditized. No one would dare to pick berries until the legal picker has paraded up and down the sidewalk carrying on her back her picking basket decorated with a representation of the sun, an act which is believed to ripen the berries. 222 424 [463] [551] [562] [532] [789]

"Get ready to pick red elderberries [or whatever species is ripe] tomorrow," she keeps calling out.

The berries may then be picked by anyone. This is repeated for every variety. As far as could be learnt, there was no social mechanism to punish a woman who picked berries before the announcement of the official picker; obedience seems to have been so universal that infractions are said to have been unknown though formerly there may have been some penalty of which even the memory has disappeared. [688] [183]

THE PROFESSION OF WARRIOR

The profession of warrior is another prerogative handed down from the distant past and requiring validation before it can be used. As with other rights of this type, magical means are in many cases employed to make any young man brave and successful, but there are a number of warriors confirmed as such by the distribution of presents at the time of bestowal on them of professional names. At the present time, it is 701 [424] [463] [431] [551]

THE PROFESSION OF CARPENTER

As with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of presents. The latter may be so clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transmitting a professional carpenter's name, however, an effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the beginning of time, Yalātimut was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yalātimut married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the old days, before the coming of the white men, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white men, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the carpenter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do. 551 575

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family. [533] 532 556 575

On the night of xlâstnum, when the work for the potlatch is allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the nuuk initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the siki, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with the type worn by nuuk, one of the many points of resemblance 556 575 [184] [535]

575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ałkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ałkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anskdwałły was a good place for a ceremony because Ałkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[31] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ałkwi danced [535] a nuxwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nuxwal dance.

In later years, Ałkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest [551] brother the name, Nuskdwałtwał, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ałkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcqinałł, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcqinałł, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the nusk, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the hamat society.[32] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural

*539 Many people landed on this mountain from on high, among others the chief Nacmit-a or Ẽqimai. He had brought with him from above a house, called *Kimdzoxq which, when set up on this earth, grew so large that all the owner's family and descendants could live within. Outside the door, Nacmit-a had caused the erection of a totem-pole, Nutlolqd. Within dwelt Echo, an incessant talker, who was very clever at learning languages; his rolling voice reverberated through the house and the whole countryside. This being acted as herald and summoned people to a [592] dance by using the word Nacnaqlika; whenever a descendant of Nacmit-a gives a potlatch he makes a mask with an ever-changing mouth to represent Echo.

Not long after the completion of the house and totem-pole Nacmit-a set out one evening to fish for salmon with the aid of torches, taking with him his infant son and several followers. During their absence a snow-slide wiped out the town, killing all the inhabitants except one slave who concealed himself within the hollow totem-pole. The slide was due to the mountain being angry at the totem-pole, carved to represent him as he was before he changed to mountain form. When the survivors returned to their buried village they at once set about rebuilding it. In time, as the people increased in numbers, it again became prosperous. They built a fish-weir to supply their wants, using tools of stone obtained from Mount Nuqalit. Ãlmi, the son of a Stuxo chief, married Nacmit-a's daughter, Skamalite-a, and Nacmit-a moved to Qmqo-ts.

Other narrators provided a little further information about Nuqalit. While still in human form, he wore a flat-topped hat with broad brim around which ran two snakes. After he had been changed to stone as a mountain, several individuals looked down on him from above and chose his shoes as a landing-place, thus making him their crest. The first to do so is said to have been a man named Qlmai.

FRAGMENT OF AN ORIGIN MYTH OF *Nulkax

In the very beginning of time, before the sky was made, Ãqamtu sent down to Nulkax three brothers and their two sisters. The names by which the men have been remembered are *Ãltzoxq, *Kimdzoxq, Sawamtlu, and the women, Sawaw-a and ushawa-i. They came to earth as golden eagles, bearing the beaver as food. The youngest sister refused to change her form, and wandered around in a semi-human condition, becoming frenzied at the slightest excuse. At length her die- [103] cedars that flourish on that part of the coast. Thanks to their supernatural power they were able to carry these easily. 539*

Returned to Smaiw-a they built a dug-out canoe of birch(?), the outside of which, and also the paddles, they decorated with abalone-shells. The effect was very beautiful, and they named the canoe, Ki'laislotl. In this craft the six set out down the Bella Coola River. When still above Smaiw they stopped to investigate a beating sound and found that it came from the house of Oḷsmai. The latter invited them to come in, using Dudzong's name, which he knew in some mysterious manner. When they entered they found that the beating sound was caused by their host's daughter, Kwaxlikim, who was sitting in the back-room, thumping a copper which she was holding as if it had been an infant. Oḷsmai was much impressed with his guests' canoe, and they with his. A trade was mutually agreeable, as a result of which the travellers obtained a copper canoe named Ełliaslotl, fitted with copper paddles. Dudzong' married Kwaxlikim, who embarked with him and his brothers and sisters. They had not gone far when they were hailed by the chief of a village, who also knew Dudzong's name.

"Dudzong'," he called out, "your canoe is not much good; it has to be paddled or poled. Let us trade. You take my canoe, Kwakwaosdal,* it travels with its own power."

Dudzong' was unwilling to part with Ełliaslotl, but at last agreed. The seven now travelled rapidly in their merganser canoe to the coast, not stopping at the villages which they saw on the way. At the mouth of the Bella Coola River, Dudzong' cast into the water one of the fish which Ałquntim had given him; it became the progenitor of all the Bella Coola olachen. The travellers went thence to the head of South Bentinck Arm where Dudzong' threw out another olachen, the forefather of all that now frequent this place. He repeated this at Rivers Inlet, at Smith Inlet, and at every land on the coast, wherefore olachen are plentiful in British Columbia at the present day. At Ełliaml, a town of which the location is uncertain, Dudzong' was received as a benefactor and given the name Pitwuhila. After visiting all the rivers on the coast Ałkwi and his party returned to Bella Coola, where they finally settled at Stuix. [825]

Throughout their travels they had carried the cedar trees with them, and they now planted them at Stuix. That is why fine cedars have flourished there since that date. The four brothers built a comfortable house and also constructed a salmon-weir in the river, which made them so prosperous that people came from far and near to pledge their daughters to the fishermen. They were able to give numerous potlatches and so display a totem-pole, the design of which Ałquntim had shown to Ałkwi [824] [532]

*539 before he came to this world. It was a large pole and stood across the sidewalk from the house, not being pierced by the doorway. At the base
● 532 was a grizzly bear, with paws wrapped around it as if desirous of climbing after the food which could be seen higher up. Immediately above the bear was an eagle's nest with four fledglings standing amid their broken eggshells and craning their necks eagerly upwards to greet the mother eagle flying back with a salmon. At the top of the pole was a ball, Nusyemda, representing the container in which the sun was enclosed; it was this that Raven broke to release light to mortals. The name of the pole was Ăl·likotl.[16]

[551] The names contained in this myth are still in use. Kănilkes was the relator of it; her ssaok song deals with Smaisy·a and, since the salmon enter Bella Coola River in hopes of reaching this place, salmon are used in the decorations of her house. The name Dudusong^{w} varies; it becomes Măsong^{w} when applied to a youth, and Măsong^{w}an·a for a girl.

FOURTH ORIGIN MYTH OF Stuix[18]

*539 Long, long ago there was in a mysterious place far to the east and far above this world, a very large house, Nulsăthmais, in which dwelt together all people, Bella Coola, Bella Bella, Carriers, and the rest. In it there lived too, all kinds of birds, including the thrush who taught each its song.
[829] The chief of the house, Sikum by name, lived there too and gave to each tribe its special language. One day he decided to visit the earth, and dived from his house downwards, becoming the sun. In this guise he came to earth on Mount Nuya, near Stuix, where he became a man and built for himself a house which was a copy of Nulsăthmais, and to which he gave the same name. Sikum became prosperous and gave many potlatches.

FRAGMENT OF A Snulle·tl ORIGIN MYTH[17]

In the beginning of time, Ălqunstm, in guise of the sun, sent down to earth a number of brothers with their one sister. Their names have been forgotten except that of the oldest man, Taiakwala, who had brought with him a beaver as provender. He released the animal, which multi-

At this juncture someone saw a party of strangers, and wondered who they might be as they entered the town. There was great rejoicing when the two brothers told their parents who they were, for they had been so transformed that they were unrecognizable. As Sā·lma had said, Łāloxmān·a's three beautiful wives came rushing up, eager to have him take them back, but he paid no attention to them. He welcomed only the ugly one, who had mourned for him, and massaged her until she became the most lovely of all. 539*

Smaoan, delighted at the safe return of his sons, and proud of Łāloxmān·a's beautiful children, sent invitations far and near to a great potlatch. At this ceremony he validated, with many presents, a seat in the house for Łāloxmān·a. The name thus confirmed was Spātcaldt, "The First Born," a name given to Łāloxmān·a by Kapsālopst. Smaoan also took this opportunity to confer names on his numerous grandchildren. After sojourning for some time in Kimsquit, the Kitlobe people returned home, richly laden with gifts.

In the course of time Wīsamkilak bore her husband two more children. Smaoan continued to prosper and to give potlatches, at one of which he gave one of his grandchildren the name Stālhmg, "Chief." This designation at once became honourable on account of the goods expended. Łāloxmān·a did not wish to forget his Kitlobe friends, so in time he sent two of his children to live there. One of them was Stālhmg, a name that has ever since remained there. Thus friendly relations between Kimsquit and Kitlobe, first opened by Łāloxmān·a, have been maintained. There have been many marriages between people of these two areas, each knows of Łāloxmān·a, and it was only about one hundred and fifty years ago that a Kimsquit woman, Ātsqutl by name, was married to a Kitlobe man to repay the original marriage of Wīsamkilak. [648] [582]

When Smaoan became old he gave yet another potlatch at which he took for himself the name Lilixwnimut, "The Scatterer." He created this from his own fertile imagination, with reference to the way in which he scattered eagle down when first travelling to the north in eagle form. It has since been used by his descendants when old. [551]

The descendants of Smaoan enjoy not only the prerogative of using this myth and the names included in it, but other privileges connected with it. If one of them gives a potlatch he carves the form of a mātsqui on the spoons to be used at it, and paints the wall of his house with a whale design. Omqemkilka's descendants are more likely than others to receive supernatural good fortune from a mātsqui. The descendants of both 539* 424 [532]

leaving Nuxmāt-a, Hamcɛt had asked Ālqunūm what they should do for a place to live and the deity had promised to provide them with one. The first night the brothers slept in the open, but the next morning they found a house completed for them on the shore of the fiord; it was of the semi-subterranean type with a central pit for the fire, surrounded by stagings. Ālqunūm had made it peculiar in several respects. When the tide rose, water was forced up through passages in the rock so that it burst within the dwelling in miniature waterspouts. The upright posts were carved in representations of Thunder, and the paintings on the back-wall were of Sminq. Echo was there, invisible as usual, but repeating everyone's speech, while around the floor ran countless mice. The name of the house was Nunuqsmāli, "Where Water Enters." 539* [776]

After a time, when the people had increased on the earth, Hamcɛt invited the chiefs, there were none other then, for a potlatch. The guests saw the wonders of the house and marvelled.

Three times Hamcɛt did this, but when he, or a descendant, attempted to do so for the fourth time, the supernatural power which had been present at the first potlatch had vanished; so carpenters were called upon to reproduce the original features. The painting of Sminq and the carving of Thunder presented no difficulties, though the latter was transferred from the house to the totem-pole without. Masks were made to represent the spouting water and manufactured mice ran on the floor by means of hidden strings. Whenever one of Hamcɛt's descendants gives a potlatch the carpenters are called upon to make realistic replicas, a form of dramatization responsible for features of potlatches not only among the Bella Coola but also, it is said, of the Bella Bella, Kitlobe, and the Tsimshian peoples. ORIGIN MYTH OF AN UNIDENTIFIED TOWN[17]

In the beginning of time the supreme god sent down two brothers, Wātkɛ and Kwatlnxlis, to Mount Wa-pat, some thirty miles up the Bella Coola River not far from Stuix. They looked around, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Glancing down they saw smoke arising; it was from Ālkwi's fire, but this they did not know, because there were few people in the land, and no one knew anything about his neighbours. Kwatlnxlis travelled a short distance upstream until he heard the sound of beating, which puzzled him, so he advanced slowly until he saw a house, to the roof of which he cautiously climbed and looked down inside. Many people had assembled there; they were land-otters giving a dance, a person has been in contact with supernatural beings to enable him to enter.

Ailsamka told them everything, that her mother had failed to teach her how to cut up black cod, "so Łemoqwa sent blackfish to catch me so that I could be taught," she said. "You must be very careful to cut them up properly or trouble will come upon you."

The correct method, as taught by Raven, is to split the fish cleanly without severing the bones. Łł-paack's daughter had erred by cutting the one which is equivalent in a fish to the human collar-bone. She told them of the fish that abounded in Łemoqwa's house; of the red-fish, which disobeyed their mother by playing outside the house so that their stomachs were often forced out from their mouths[10] and they floated up to the surface; of Łemoqwa himself and his large hat; and of the other denizens of the underworld. The people listened attentively and ever after cut up black cod in the prescribed fashion, though if Ailsamka had not been carried off to Łemoqwa's house Raven's teaching would undoubtedly have been forgotten.

Not long after his daughter's safe return Łł-paack gave a potlatch. He took for himself the name Łemoqwa, and at the same time reproduced in his own house as much as possible of what his daughter had described. Thus there were imitation fishes, especially the halibut, around the house, while the red-fish were shown as wooden models that could be drawn up to the roof by hidden strings representing the manner in which the fish float up to the surface of the ocean. Łemoqwa, himself, was shown wearing his large ball topped hat, of the type known as bipul.[11]

While Ailsamka was under the water Łemoqwa had shown her nasak whistles, and at this potlatch they were used while the girl was concealed within the back-room as a nasak initiate.

This was the[12] origin of the nasak ceremonial, which spread in time from the sitting people to the Bella Coola. The name Łemoqwa passed to one of Łł-paack's descendants who, when he gave a potlatch, arranged [10] The red-fish is an unidentified deep-sea fish which dies in shallow water through lack of pressure.

[11] This style was always worn by Łemoqwa and Alquastm and, as many of the first people obtained their power from one or other of these beings, the prerogative of using such hats at potlatches is quite common. They are made of cedar roots, are waterproof, and are usually painted with one of the wearer's ancestral crests. When either Łemoqwa or Alquastm is shown on a totem-pole he is displayed with one of these hats.

[12] It will be noted that the narrator tacitly assumes any origin recorded in his myth to be the sole, or authentic one.

looked upon with contempt by her family, was yet determined that nothing she had done should ruin her children's chances in life. Accordingly she donated $300 to her ex-husband to rebuy herself. Marriage is accepted as a matter of course, but to be many times repurchased is the goal of every ambitious woman. In Tăl-is the custom prevails of depicting on the rocks the number of coppers paid for repurchasing a wife. Thus her fame is displayed to all. 556 583 [184] [532]

It is somewhat difficult for a white man to realize what a privilege the family of a wife considers it to repurchase her from her husband. If the latter is unwilling to give a potlatch, his relatives-in-law may urge him to do so, and if he still declines to exert himself they take the drastic step of inviting their fellow-villagers to assemble in his house where, with these guests as witnesses, the wife's relatives give presents to her husband and his relations. They may make this presentation at any gathering where they are assured of a large audience. In so doing the donors have demonstrated their proper sentiments, in spite of the inertness of the husband.

The assistance which the relatives of a wife have given her husband is a matter about which they can boast for the rest of their lives, a fact impressed upon the writer by listening to a quarrel between two Bella Coola men. One of them owned a horse and waggon which the other had hired to move some goods. The latter became very angry, claiming that the former had overcharged him and must be poor and greedy to be so eager to acquire money. The teamster, thus deeply insulted, silenced the other man by reminding him that the only reason he was wealthy was by means of the goods used to repurchase his, the teamster's, sister from her husband, brother of the man with whom he was disputing. To the observer the dispute was made more interesting by the fact that both the husband and wife had been dead for at least fifteen years, but their families had not ceased to remember the financial obligations connected with the marriage. 556 583 578

ciety. These are given several times, serving to recall the 533 ceremonies in which the chief took part during his life. At 575 intervals, the new song is repeated and sisaok members of the 766 audience join in as they become familiar with the words. Frequently one or more relatives of the deceased dance in his [535] stead during the singing. The details of this rite, especially of the songs used at it, differ considerably according to the actions of the person during life; if a mighty chief, the donor of many potlatches, this fact is described in the song, whereas only an incident from the ancestral myth can be used for a young sisaok. If some of his female relatives are professional [767] wailers, they function during the ceremony. In all circumstances, the rite aims to comfort the grieving kinsmen, an end which it usually achieves.

As already described, sisaok ceremonial was in a state of 575 transition at the time of the coming of the white man. Pre- 766 vious to that date, a spectacular funeral prerogative had been 177 adopted from Rivers Inlet,[4] which has since been claimed by a 424 number of sisaok. All the Bella Coola know of this ceremony, [178] and most of them desire to perform it at the death of a dearly loved relative; at the present time this is possible owing to the slight regard paid to prerogatives, but it is certain that a few years ago it would have been forbidden to most people, and that it was never a universal Bella Coola rite.

When this rite is performed, the corpse is allowed to remain 575
in its coffin for at least one night after the day on which 766 Mulakila came and the sisaok songs were sung. Meanwhile 532
the carpenters have prepared an imitation body, usually of rags on a light framework, and a wooden representation of the deceased's crest. Since this figure is to come through the roof and carry aloft the corpse, stout hooks are attached to its feet.
In theory, the bird or animal disguise used by the first ancestor

575 766 [532] of the deceased, traced patrilineally, should come for the body, but this is difficult to arrange in case of whale, bear, and other marine or land mammals. Consequently, it has been customary to use only raven or eagle for this purpose, and it is assumed that at least one of these birds is present in the ancestral history of every individual as a result of the marriage of some of his forbears with a woman possessing one of these crests.[1] It is a common practice for an influential sisaok to prepare a figure of this kind during his life-time and tell a son or other trusted relative where it has been hidden; if this has been done, it obviates the necessity of carpenters manufacturing one at short notice.

Several days are often required to complete these arrangements, but on the first evening possible, which may be two or three days after the death, the people are summoned to the dead man's house. The singers take their usual positions behind the fire and beat out the song used at the mourning ceremony already described; then, as on that occasion, they follow it with a number of the deceased's sisaok songs. Once more they strike up the one newly composed and, as it is proceeding, whistling is heard, accompanied by the screaming of an eagle or the croaking of a raven. Those who are not members of the sisaok society do not understand that these sounds are produced by hidden members blowing whistles on the roof. There is a crash on the planking and, through a space opened by the removal of several boards, the face of the bird crest can be seen peering in. It is a dramatic spectacle and the audience gasps appreciatively, especially those who see in it a manifestation of the supernatural, testifying to the importance of the deceased. If the stage management has been accurate, the figure appears at the termination of the song, but if it has arrived during the actual singing, the singers beat time slowly and cease to use their voices. The eagle, or raven, keeps squealing repeatedly and gradually comes through prerogatives connected with the ceremony. The actual re- 556*

counting of the myths may be done by a fluent speaker on 769 behalf of the bereaved man, and when he has finished speaking, [533]
it is proper for several of his peers to make complimentary speeches, lauding the future donor for his intentions. Food is [537] then served and the gathering breaks up.

The preliminaries of a memorial potlatch do not differ from those of an ordinary one. There is the same counting and recounting of goods, the same giving and receiving of presents, the same lending and borrowing. When at last the donor is ready, the heralds call his fellow-villagers to his house for announcement of the arrangements and allotment of the work. As at a potlatch, food is provided on a lavish scale, and there is the same sham-fight with a battering-ram ending in the destruction of part of the house. Then the carpenters receive their instructions; some to make different sections of the new structure, some to paint ancestral designs on the front and back walls, and some to make the various objects required.

The first difference between a memorial and an ordinary 211
potlatch is apparent at this allotment of work. Instead of a 556*
totem-pole to record the glories of the donor's ancestry,[11] car- 764
penters are requested to make memorial-posts for the dead 769 relative who is being commemorated. These are erected in the cemetery near the grave and are of three kinds, although it is unusual for all three to be set up for a single chief.

The first consists of a wooden post carved with the design of one or more of the deceased's crests (see Plates 19 and 20). [532]
These figures are usually representations of the bird or animal cloaks used by his first ancestors; it is customary to portray the one traced through the father on the right, that traced through the mother on the left. Instead of a cloak, the figure may portray the post down which swarmed his first ancestor in the beginning of time, or Mount Nusdalst in human form, wearing a broad-rimmed hat as he did before he turned to

211 stone and served as landing-place for some of the first settlers.
*556 In fact, any of the dead person's crests may be used according 764 to the wishes of the chief giving the memorial potlatch. A 769 figure displayed in this way cannot be used as the guise in which the dead relative returns, but as every individual has several crests, inability to use one does not make it difficult to carry out the rite. According to one well-informed old man, when a design has once been used in a cemetery it cannot again be shown by members of the ancestral family, having itself become "dead." Other informants flatly contradicted this statement, and it seems clear that the above is true only with regard to the use of the figure in connection with the return of the deceased. The erection of the figure serves to remind all beholders, especially foreign guests summoned to the memorial potlatch, of the ancestral myth of the deceased. It is, there-[778] fore, equivalent to a totem-pole erected during a man's lifetime, in fact, one of these is sometimes moved to the cemetery to serve as a memorial-post (see Plate 21). Instead of placing a representation of the crest in the cemetery, one is sometimes painted on broad boards and placed on some conspicuous promontory where all who pass by will see it and think of the person commemorated.

The second type of memorial consists of plain poles set upright in the cemetery, one for each major ceremony given by the deceased. Potlatches, memorial potlatches, and kukusiutak [609] (II, p. 29) are alone indicated in this way, these being the only ones to which foreign guests are invited. These poles suggest, in a general way, the greatness of the deceased.

The third type of memorial-post comprises representations of the goods given away by the deceased. These are usually [532] painted on boards attached to a post set up near the grave. On this are pictures of canoes, coppers, slaves, and other valuables distributed at potlatches or memorial potlatches (see Plate 22). Alternatively, there may be a series of small poles, each surmounted by a model canoe manned by miniature human figures, symbolic of a canoe and slaves given away

(see Plate 23). So, too, wooden representations of coppers are often affixed to an upright post. Not only men are commemorated in this way, a father often places over his daughter's grave pictures of the goods used to rebuy her from her husband; wooden plaques representing coppers are commonly used for this purpose.[24] Such symbols are usually cut down after a year owing to a vague feeling that it is not proper for them to remain standing too long. The function of this type of memorial is to mark the social status of the dead person as judged by the riches given away by him, or on his behalf, during his life-time. With the introduction of writing, the Bella Coola have been quick to recognize it as an easy means for recording the wealth distributed by a chief. In consequence, signs are often painted and erected, giving in figures a statement of his financial transactions. Another recent introduction has been the tombstone. One of these is often set up with the name of the deceased carved on it to perpetuate his memory, and a representation of his crest to record his ancestral history. Such a memorial combines the functions of the first and third types.

211 556* 764 769 [532] [177] [212] [532]

As the carpenters labour at the memorials, other arrangements for the ceremony proceed apace. As at a potlatch, the fellow-villagers of the donor may be invited repeatedly to his house for the performance of susaok dances, but this feature is often omitted, especially if there are no neophytes to be initiated. The mask to be worn by the deceased relative must be prepared in secret; or if several are to be commemorated at the single ceremony, one must be made ready for each. As the time draws near, envoys are dispatched to invite foreign guests if it has been decided to have strangers present. This has been customary for many years, but during the period when no features of the potlatch were allowed at a memorial potlatch, the latter was sometimes carried out in the presence of the donor's fellow-villagers alone. The actual departure of the 769 expression animated, and, except for his dirty European clothing, he looked and acted like a religious dignitary taking part *556 in an important ceremony, as was indeed the case. While he was speaking there came from without eerie notes of the large, cone-shaped whistles, combined with the yelping scream of an eagle. The effect, even on an audience which knew that these sounds were of human origin, was tremendous. Men and women stiffened in their seats and craned their necks to see what was taking place near the door. A number of the younger 769 men had slipped away during Reuben's singing to help the *556 masked dancer with his disguise. As some of these assistants 535 continued to blow their whistles, others held up blankets to conceal the necessarily clumsy entrance of the performer through the narrow doorway.

These were dropped after a moment, and out into the centre of the open hall bounded a figure covered with a large white sheet so that only his bare feet were visible. On his head was [532] an eagle mask, from the upper part of his back projected a blackfish, while the head of a raven peered forth from his chest.
The dancer, Timothy Snow, who had been chosen for his skill in such matters, leapt forward in a crouching attitude and took a few short, mincing steps as if he were a gigantic eagle hopping on the ground. At once the older Bella Coola women began to drone out, "i . . . . ," and continued as long as the performer remained in the hall. He bent down and turned slowly, sun-wise, with arms pressed close to his body and neck contracted, then straightened, and took a few more mincing steps, followed by another turn. In this way he moved in a wide, sunwise circle around the hall, avoiding the middle where there would have been a fire in one of the old-fashioned houses. At intervals he raised himself on his toes and slightly spread his arms beneath the sheet, at the same time looking up so that it appeared as if the eagle were rising to gaze at an object in the distance as a sitting bird does so frequently. This brought the raven mask into plain sight. After a survey of this kind, he bent down and ran a few yards more. Alec Davis and two other sisaok folmen had vanished. It is possible that in this particular case there was a belief that Ałquntăm granted the wish when convinced that all had the same desire, but this element is often entirely lacking.

Belief in the power of thought is a concept which the investigator constantly meets in Bella Coola at the present day. For example, in 1921 a government official working in the valley, purchased a representation of a merganser which had been used in a ceremonial.[1] Although this should have been destroyed after use, no difficulty would have been raised if the transaction had remained a secret. Unfortunately, the buyer allowed the object to be seen by several Bella Coola and by some Carriers. This caused indignation throughout the community and news of it reached the Bella Bella, who concluded that the vendor would suffer disaster for allowing a secret object to be seen by the despised Indians of the interior. Within a year, his wife died. The Bella Bella believed that his sin had brought its own punishment, but the Bella Coola, who knew the details of the sale and did not consider the exposure of the article to have been the fault of the seller, attributed it to the power of the thoughts of the Bella Bella. They all expected that he would be punished; therefore he was punished; the expectation was sufficient to effect its own fulfilment. This incident was too fresh in the minds of several men to allow them to sell ceremonial objects to the writer.

The most common form taken by this conviction is with regard to death; if it is believed that a man will die, he is almost certain to do so. In June, 1922, a woman died in Bella Coola and her father claimed that she had been murdered by a certain man either with material poison or by magical means. He took no direct steps in revenge but stated emphatically that the man whom he suspected would die within a year. The threatened man knew of this, and more than once said that he

[1] The article, now in the National Museum of Canada, consists of a cloth and wood representation of a merganser canoe such as was used by Nestila in the beginning of time.

533 In the beginning of time it used to sing.

789 "I shall use a spoon and eat when the Bella Coola River has burst its bounds on account of the teeming salmon in it."

825 The people used to laugh as it repeated this song year after year,

856 until the bird changed its note:

[539] "I shall use a spoon and eat when all is cold and clear. Then there will be Death instead of salmon in Bella Coola."

The next year the streams were so clear that no fish could be caught and the starving people asked the bird to return to its first song. When it did so, the water became murky so that it was possible to catch salmon once more.

The Bella Bella, not the Bella Coola, use the body of a blue jay to cause an infant to grow up with the ability to master difficult tunes in the same way that the bird has a variety of notes. The method of applying this medicine could not be learnt.

789 Most of the above medicines are well known and can be applied by any parent. If, however, a man has employed one

856 of them successfully on a number of occasions, he is often requested to use his ability for others. In such a case, the father of the benefited child is expected to reimburse his friend.

[184] The application or non-application of such medicines is purely the concern of the child's family; they can use as many as they like, or none at all, according to their discretion.

The following medicines are used during the first year of life:

To Cause Beauty

304 Bandages of the softest undyed cedar-bark are prepared for 789 infants of both sexes soon after birth. A woman who is a good

856 artist is requested to draw with charcoal two pictures on one

●532 of the pieces of bark—of handsome men if the child is a boy, or of lovely women if a girl. An unmarked wrapping is fastened round the infant's head, then the painted one so arranged that one picture is over the forehead, the other over the occiput, and finally other plain bandages to cover the whole. These

and back of the head, preventing a bulging appearance which is considered ugly, while the paintings ensure beauty of countenance. Cranial deformation has no supernatural sanction, though it is believed to have been carried out for generations. 304 789 856 [532] [826]

To Cause Leanness

Place pieces of caribou skin on an infant's wrists and ankles and leave them in position for several months. He will grow up lean and wiry, like the animal. 789 856 [825]

To Cause Left-handedness

Shake the left hand of an infant while lying in the cradle and he will be left-handed throughout life. To do this is considered a malevolent action.

To Cause the Hair to Grow (two means)

(1) Rub the infant's scalp with the eye of a Hakwik (red cod?), freshly removed from the fish's head. [825]

(2) Boil stems of the swamp gooseberry in water and rub the mixture over the infant's scalp. [824]

Wise mothers always apply one or other of these remedies to their children.

To Cause Ability in Singing (two means)

(1) When an infant is a few months old, the parents frequently request a good singer to impart to him ability similar to his own. He takes his beating-stick, spits on it, and rubs it over the child's heart, saying: 533 789 856

"Please be a singer."

This is done only for male children. [858]

(2) Boil together herbs and a bear's bladder and smear the decoction on the infant's back. He must thenceforth wear around his neck for several months a small sack containing four blue grouse gall-bladders (possibly stones from the crop were meant). This gives the child the singing ability of the bird, but the significance of the bear bladder is unknown. [825]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

To Cause Strength

Place pieces of octopus flesh in the infant's bowl and wash him with these. This causes him to grow up with the strength of the animal. 825 856 789

To Cause Understanding of the Speech of Ravens

When a child is able to toddle, but has not learnt to talk, shut him in a box and turn this upside down. Leave him alone for four days and four nights, passing in what food is necessary during darkness.

Knowledge of this medicine was learnt from ilkas, a female slave born near New Westminster who was owned by the maternal grandfather of the wife of the elderly Kimsquit man from whom this information was obtained. The slave's father had treated her in this way when an infant; while so confined she had not only learnt the language of ravens, but Cowichan, her own speech, as well. ilkas used to tell the Kimsquit people of her ability, but few believed her, though she asserted that this was a well-known Cowichan method, and her captors had their own means of imparting the same ability to their children, as well as an ancient tradition of the practice she described. One day she informed her master that the ravens had told her of the near approach of a raiding-party. He summoned the chiefs, but they laughed at the warning and disregarded it. ilkas received the same intimation for four days, and on the fourth the raiders appeared and she was vindicated.

The inversion of the box is due to the belief that ravens, when bringing news, turn over upon themselves like tumbler pigeons. The Bella Coola do not know whether the box must be so tight as to hold the child upside down.

To Cause Ceremonial Intelligence 856

When a child is one or two years of age, paint on its back the picture of a black bear's gall-bladder. Leave this in position for four days, then wash it off secretly in a mountain stream. A child so treated will grow up with ability to perform 789 532

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

789 ceremonial dances without making mistakes. The Bella Bella 856 paint a representation of a wolf's bladder for the same purpose.
[532] The basis of this medicine is the belief that it is the gall-[826] bladder which causes wildness and intelligent fear, and hence that anyone so treated will be careful not to make mistakes.
[825] A bird with a large bladder is thought to be difficult to approach, whereas a deer, which has a small one, or none at all, is often stupidly brave. This medicine is known only to the mem-
[424] bers of certain families and is used for the children of chiefs [622] alone, since errors on the part of others is a matter of little importance.

MEDICINES OF CHILDHOOD

789 Some of the instruction given to boys and girls, and the 856 acts which they are enjoined to perform, are virtually religious, and have accordingly been described in earlier chapters. For 771 example, when a lad washes in the river before daybreak, scours himself with a smooth stone and prays to Alquntām, he is carrying out what might with justice be called a religious act. If, however, he believes that mere washing is enough to compel some desire or end, it is magical. Different Bella Coola have different sentiments concerning the exact means by which this method causes the desired effect. To some it is unquestionably a true prayer, but in other families it is customary for a father to take his son, when he has reached about eight years of age, and wash him four times, to the accompaniment of the usual prayer. It is believed that this causes the lad to grow up powerful and active, constantly striving for success. This type of washing may be called magical.

789 In the following there is no element of uncertainty; they 856 belong unquestionably to the category described in the preceding section.

To Cause Agility

The following medicine is frequently employed by fathers when their sons are first able to walk:

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The first night is lsuxtälaix or lsuxtämem.[5] This is when the call comes to a prospective dancer. This may be heralded by whistling from above, made by a kusiut sent with a whistle to a neighbouring mountain for the purpose, by a thud on the roof, likewise produced by an accomplice, or by no intimation whatever. The dancer utters a low call, sometimes begins to walk in circles with bent head, or to act in some other peculiar manner, while a whistle sounds repeatedly. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house and a herald informs the village that something strange has come upon the dancer. The kukusiut gather in his house, and four times help him by the frenzied, but regular, beating of sticks. Then the singers sing a song previously prepared, the words describing either his patron or the land above. After listening closely, the kukusiut join in and rehearse it until it is familiar. The dancer may or may not perform; if he is inadept in the steps, he does so for practice. If the hour is not too late, the singers may choose, purely for practice, to beat out a number of the songs of those kukusiut who have already performed during the ceremonial season. A meal, provided by the dancer and his family, is then served. The singers next beat out the dancer's song once more and he dances, concluding the evening's performance. Novices and those who have already performed during the season take up their abode in the dancer's house, where they remain for the ensuing four days and nights.

The second day is nusiutälsap.[6] Quite early in the morning a herald calls the kukusiut to the dancer's house, an invitation accepted by as many as wish to do so. A second song is usually composed and practised in the same manner as on the previous evening. Several kukusiut are sent to the forest to cut wood for masks, the number of sections required depending upon the number to be used. In the evening all members of the society assemble to practise the songs.[7] The making of the masks

[5] In Kimsquit called Älxwoltämm.

[6] The term qai·nugs is occasionally used for the rites occurring on the day itself.

[7] The rehearsal of the second is sometimes postponed until this time.

*575 796 ●532 [431] 465 [104] is allotted to different kukusiut, usually in accordance with the dancer's wishes, although a marshal normally gives out the actual tasks. The dancer, or one of his relatives, bestows presents on each person to whom work is allotted. The evening of nusiutälsap is called ämllämkum.

The third day is qothm. Those to whom mask making has been entrusted assemble early in the dancer's house to start their work. About noon they are provided with a meal, to which other kukusiut may be invited. By late afternoon, when most of the work has been accomplished, the chips are carefully swept up and burnt, and the house tidied, ready for the uninitiated who will be invited during the evening. On either this *575 796 day or the one preceding, a platform, with raised sides, is built behind the fire on which the dancer can conceal himself and where he is supposed to remain during the remainder of the four days. About dusk the kukusiut are called in; the singers take their places behind the fire, Cannibals, Breakers, and Scratchers are in one of the back corners, where a matting enclosure may have been constructed for them, and the remainder group themselves without distinction around the walls. In Kimsquit, though not in Bella Coola, one or more [184] of the masks may be displayed, suspended from a sloping pole behind the fire. If the singers think it necessary, they may [533] practise the dancer's two songs once more. Then the uninitiated are called in, taking their places near the doorway. The singers beat out one of the dancer's songs and he dances in time to it, and the same is repeated for his second song. After some delay, which appears to be one of the requisites of every kusiut performance, the singers strike up the songs of either a novice or a kusiut, especially one who has already had a call during the ceremonial season, and the one thus summoned dances to his two songs. Late in the season, when many kukusiut have performed, only one song may be used, to prevent the ceremony dragging out to an interminable length, and songs of previous years are omitted. In any case, the ritual lasts for most of the night. When all have danced, the uninitiated are expelled, with the exception of the sisaok to whom, as guests, a meal is served. Then they too leave and the kukusiut eat together. Finally, the singers strike up one of the dancer's songs, and he dances to it to end the evening's rites. 575* 796

The fourth day is nebusam, "That Which Is Opened." During the day the carpenters work to complete the masks, and towards dusk the house is again put in order. The kukusiut are summoned again to practise the songs, if necessary, and always to arrange who shall wear the masks, a matter left to the marshals and the carpenters. Then the uninitiated are called in to see the masked figures and watch any dramatic representation. After their exclusion, the masks are burnt. Then the kukusiut gather outside the dancer's house where his song is sung once more to send his call back above. Frequently another kusiut now receives a call, so that the nebusam of one dancer is likewise the lsixtämem for another. The kukusiut assemble in the latter's house, but the uninitiated are not allowed to return to that from which they have been ejected until the platform-enclosure has been destroyed at the end of the season. [104] [532] [533] [532]

A word might be said about kusiut paraphernalia, although much of this will have to be described in detail for special dances. Boas gives illustrations of a large number of kusiut masks and gives such an admirable description of them that little need be added. They are carved from the solid wood, the larger of beech, the smaller of alder, and each carpenter endeavours to make a striking effigy of the being portrayed. Ano°likwolsaix is present at every dance and has become so well standardized that she can always be recognized. This is true, also, for Thunder, Echo, the haohao, the Laugher, the Hermaphrodite, and a few other supernatural beings, but so much variation occurs in others that even a kusiut of much experience cannot always tell what being is represented. The masks are painted, and sometimes the designs indicate the being, even though the carving fails to do so; verisimilitude is 575* 796 532 [114] [824] [776]

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*575 not considered necessary. With few exceptions, hereafter to 796 be noted, kusiut masks are burnt at the conclusion of each ceremony, a practice which probably originated in order to ●532 avoid the possibility of their being seen by the uninitiated.
[171] The Bella Coola state that this is one of the most striking differences between their rites and those of the Bella Bella.

*575 Next in importance to masks are whistles (see Plate 2).[1] 796 The large, cone-shaped form used in sisaok ceremonial is re-534 placed in kusiut dances by a smaller type consisting of portions of wood glued together, which can be blown with ease from beneath a concealing blanket. Another type has bellows con-[237] sisting of a mountain goat bladder, which is held beneath the arm-pit so that it can be worked invisibly. During the summer the whistles are kept by one individual, usually a [422] marshal. Specific information concerning the ownership of these whistles could not be obtained; it appears that any kusiut can make one, or have one made for him by a skilled carpenter, and that their retention by one person during the [426] summer is merely for convenience. They are freely lent to anyone for use in a ceremony.

*575 In some dances special objects are used in connection with 796 dramatic performances, such as bull-roarers, wooden repre-532 sentations of animals, birds, or miniature human beings. One old man described a pipe formerly used at Tāl·io, which had [534] a carved bowl as large as a tea-cup with three radiating stems.
[824] It was carved from a knotty excrescence on a beech bole.
Little could be learnt of its history, except that it was supposed to have been carved by a chief with the design of his patron and displayed through pride.

*575 The usual guests at a performance of the type just sum-609 marized are the dancer's fellow-villagers and any strangers 796 who happen to be present in the town. Great as is the desire of the kukusiut to impress their uninitiated tribesmen, they [648] are still more eager to impress strangers, hence the presence [123] of Carriers adds piquancy to the rites. The writer believes that his presence and interest encouraged the Bella Coola to *575 while X dances to and fro behind the fire. In succession the *796 six songs previously composed are resung and X dances to 533 each. The singers would be disgraced should they forget either a tune or a text, so they take advantage of lsuxtämem to practise them all. Later in the season, when numerous kukusiut have received calls, the singers beat out the time and words for each and the owner dances. The general effect is remarkably impressive in the dim light of one of the large wooden houses, nor is the music displeasing to the ear. After the singing of X's seventh song, there is a pause while food is distributed amid the admonitions of the marshals. Once more the singers take up their sticks and beat out the song most recently composed for X; the audience joins in softly and he dances. The kukusiut now disperse with the exception of the novices who sleep in X's house. He himself does not withdraw to his platform. The ritual of X's lsuxtämem differs from that of most kukusiut since his comrades have already learnt six songs for him. On most occasions they hear and practise one only, to which he dances in the manner described.

*575 The next day is nusiutälsap. About eleven o'clock in the
*796 morning the heralds go to every house calling out:

● 532 Tłpänap, łłpänap, kukusiaot, "Cut, cut, ye kukusiut."

*[203] The uninitiated do not realize that this is an invitation to gather to cut wood for masks. X, or his relatives, always provides a meal which is eaten before the main work is attended to. Then the singers group themselves and compose still

[533] another song[11] for X, with the same theme, but different words, as the one composed the previous evening. When ready, they chant it loudly so that all can hear and learn, and then sing it with the audience joining in, while X dances. After a short pause, X asks as many of his comrades as he desires to go with

[784] him to the forest to cut wood. Some member of the party carries a whistle which he sounds at intervals, thus warning

[176] [11]This would normally be a dancer's second song, the large number practised for X before the coming of his call being unusual. Not many years ago a powerful chief created the innovation of having one song only instead of two. Some kukusiut follow his example whereas others still use two.

[The Dance of Noakxnim]

any uninitiated from their path. The kukusiut also call hoip repeatedly, a further deterrent to the inquisitive. Alder and birch trees are selected and the hewers start to work. Whenever a tree falls, one of the party calls out: 575* 796 532

Xwu....

This meaningless ejaculation, spoken as if by X, has the virtue of causing the tree to fall gently. The logs are cut into sections and as many provided as will be needed, since it is contrary to kusiut custom for more than one trip to be made for wood. Towards dusk the cutters return, each carrying a burden by means of a tump-line across the forehead. The wood is laid softly on the floor, for it would be a gross insult to throw it down roughly. Meanwhile heralds are summoning the kukusiut with a call of: [784] [313] [789] [482] [203]*

Nusiutälsap kukusiaot.

X has long since consulted his relatives on the one hand and the marshals on the other, concerning the number of masks to be used, and the beings to be portrayed. A mask of Ăno'likwolsaix is prepared for every kusiut dance, but with this exception there is no uniformity in the representations. A man always shows his patron, as well as any beings intimately connected with him. Thus X must have a mask of Noăkxnum, many of his passengers, and the supernatural beings who meet him at the mouth of the river. A present must be given to the carver of every mask, hence their actual number depends upon the expenditure X and his relatives are willing to make. [431] [465]

At dusk the kukusiut are summoned by the heralds. X is with the marshals behind the fire and he heeds their advice as to the best carpenter for any special mask. When all have assembled X holds up one of the blocks of wood, calls on one of the kukusiut by name and says: [203]*

"For Noăkxnum," or whatever may be the figure required.

As the carpenter comes forward to take the billet the heralds call out: [203]*

"Pay attention to him," and as the carpenter takes the wood, X calls out at the top of his voice, xwu.... [789]

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*575 This ejaculation is supposed to make the work of manu-
*796 facture less difficult. The same procedure is repeated with 532 every mask ordered, except that if the being to be represented [789] is a woman, X's ejaculation is i ····. Any kusiut can make a mask, but the preference is always given to a man who has shown ability in previous tasks. The carpenters endeavour to follow well-recognized designs for many representations, but a great deal of latitude is allowed, and a workman receives greater praise and fame for turning out a fine and distinctive piece of new design, than for rigid adherence to a former type. This, combined with the burning of masks and consequent loss of permanent patterns, is responsible for the variability in Bella Coola forms, and the difficulty which they themselves experience in recognizing portrayed beings.

*575 As soon as all the carpentry has been allotted, the singers
*796 strike up one of X's eight songs. Whether or not he dances [593] to them is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion among informants. In any case the re-singing on nusiutâlsap is purely for rehearsal, made necessary by the large number of songs. Later on in the kusiut season, the songs of other dancers may be practised on this night, and if the owners wish to practice their steps, it is quite proper for them to do so.
[574] Finally, a meal is distributed, while the marshals discourse in [431] the usual way. Feasts are features of all kusiut dances, and the [424] food distributed is regarded as a free-will gift, without thought of repayment. After eating, the kukusiut disperse; X must sleep within his own house, but no longer remains within his platform-enclosure.

*575 The next day, the twenty-sixth of the ceremony, is qatkm.
*796 Early in the morning a herald summons to X's house, where 532 the blocks have been left, all those to whom work has been *[203] assigned. All morning they carve diligently. The speed with which masks are completed is surprising, although this has [177] undoubtedly increased since the introduction of metal tools.
[562] In the middle of the day a few kukusiut men, no women, are invited to share "the carpenters' meal," as the food provided by X is called. Having dined, the guests depart while the craftsmen continue their labours. Towards dusk the house is cleared up, the chips thrown on the fire and everything made ready. On this night the uninitiated are invited, but there is a wide and important difference in ritual between Bella Coola and Kimsquit. In the former the masks are carefully concealed, whereas in Kimsquit one or two, or sometimes all, are suspended behind the fire by the carpenters. It is exceedingly difficult for an observer to understand why this practice does not at once remove all secrecy from the rite. The explanation appears to lie in the fact that the uninitiated, ignorant of how they have been made, see in these strange objects evidence of the power of the kukusiut. In Kimsquit, moreover, members of the society emphasize the fact that the dances are supernaturally endowed representations of what the beings above are doing and performing, and it is only at certain rites that they are actually supposed to be present. One old Bella Coola remembered having heard from his grandfather that long before his time the carpenters used to make the masks in their own houses where the uninitiated could see them; the dancer would come in, wave his arm over the craftsman's head and cry hoip if the workmanship was excellent. The man who described this expressed his own scepticism, and added that it would have destroyed the key-note of secrecy. A possible explanation of this important difference in ritual will be given at the end of this chapter; for the present it will be enough to point out that the masks are left suspended in Kimsquit, and concealed in Bella Coola.

Towards dusk the herald goes to every house to summon the kukusiut, who have adorned themselves for the ceremony by washing and painting, as the uninitiated have also done. The members assemble slowly, in fact an observer finds the interminable delays of every kusiut dance most provoking. At last all have appeared and taken their places around the fire, while the uninitiated eagerly wait near the door for the invitation which they know will soon be given. One of the mar-

The next day is nakusam,[22] the twenty-seventh and final day of the rite, and the most spectacular in every ceremonial. Early in the morning a herald summons the wood-workers to X's house to complete the masks. At intervals throughout the day kakusiut come to discuss with X, the marshals, the singers, and the carpenters the details of the evening ceremonial. In fact, X has less to do with the arrangements than any of those mentioned, unless he happens to be a kusiut of long standing. The marshals usually decide who shall wear the masks, although the maker of each is always consulted; X himself never wears one at his own ceremony. The kusiut who is to represent Ano'likwolsaix must have the ability to speak fluently and in a high-pitched voice supposedly like that of a woman. Strong men are required for some of the heavy masks such as Thunder, but most may be used by anyone. A person asked to wear one seldom refuses, although he is liable to punishment in case of dropping it or any other accident. No one marshal can dictate who shall wear a particular mask, all these matters are arranged with endless discussion during the day; stage management is not a highly developed Bella Coola profession. The masks are completed by the afternoon at latest, painted, and concealed behind a matting enclosure, one of which is built in each rear corner of the house. Sometimes the back-room itself is used to hide the sacred objects and only one shelter is constructed. The makers of the masks remain there with them, to assist in tying them over the heads of the wearers. Meanwhile all chips are swept up and burnt and the house made tidy for the evening. 575* 796* 532 ● [203] *

As twilight falls a herald goes to every house inviting the kakusiut to assemble in X's. The uninitiated gather outside the door, waiting eagerly for the summons to enter and see the wonders; their curiosity, and fear, piqued by the sound of a whistle from within. But there are still delays; many of the kakusiut wish to express themselves concerning the conduct of 575* 796* [203] *

[22] If the masks and other paraphernalia are not ready, several days may elapse before nakusam. Every evening the kakusiut gather to practise the songs. [533]

has been in contact. Their attitude of uncertainty as to whether they are gazing upon real supernatural beings or on representations of them has already been described, but the uninitiated do not theorize on the point—they are seeing strange sights about which X and the kukusiut know, that is enough for them. 575* 796*

Behind the fire they see a canoe-shaped erection, a model of Noākynum's craft, with six or eight masked heads, his passengers, appearing over the sides. Near this are four more disguised figures, three standing and one sitting. Ano'likwolsaix ranges in the vicinity, while X himself stands behind, at intervals sweeping one arm over the heads of the strange beings and uttering a droning cry. Ano'likwolsaix explains to the uninitiated that the figures have come from afar, that they are powerful, but not to be afraid, since X's drone gives protection to them from the supernatural ones. She points to one of the figures whose mask is painted with the design of a salmon.[14] 575* 796* 532 776

"See!" she says, "There is Noākynum; unless he brings the salmon they cannot come to our river."

Another of the standing figures is described as Dakdakānmem, and the other as Ālālhmktnum. In each case she states briefly the functions of the being. The seated figure, who wears a large hat and rests on a mat, is the Resident. Great is the mystification of the uninitiated at seeing these supernatural beings[15] normally visible only to X. How they envy him! Another frequent display is of a group of masked figures playing sleli (II, p. 382). If this has been done, Ano'likwolsaix explains that this game is of interest to the salmon and that it is therefore played in Noākynum's canoe. [781]

[14]There is no doubt that in former times the Bella Coola attached greater importance to the designs painted on masks than they do at present. Except for a few vague notes it was impossible to obtain information on this subject; in fact, in 1922 there was only one Bella Coola alive who understood the symbols used. This man was drunk so often that he proved an impossible informant. It is fortunate that Professor Boas recorded a considerable number of designs (op. cit.), to which the reader is referred. [177]

[15]As already described, the uninitiated undoubtedly believe that they are actually gazing upon supernatural beings.

*575 *796 ● 532 533 Among the passengers in Noökynum's canoe are a number of singers, who replace the usual ones on this nałuxam. Each wears the same type of mask, painted with red diagonals, and with white feathers[66] projecting from the top.[67] After the uninitiated have gazed for some time upon the wonders, their leader, Snałxwnimałik, takes his place and his followers begin to beat out an ancient song, believed to be sung in Noökynum's craft as it nears Bella Coola. The theme is:

"See me, mortals, I am Nuwunałxikdimut Noökynum, the dancer of Noökynum."

As the music starts, a figure rises from among the singers, wearing a mask with heavy eye-brows[68] and carrying a light staff about six feet in length, wound spirally with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with a tassel of dyed bark. Holding this in his hand he begins to *575 *796 dance lightly, running back and forth a few steps at a time in time to the beating of sticks, lifting his feet freely from the ground, and bending back and forth in airy grace, all the while [535] waving his wand to and fro. There are no fixed steps, the only essential is that he convey the impression of being light of foot and a good dancer; accordingly, the person selected for this purpose is one with these qualifications. As he moves, Ano'likwałxais explains to the uninitiated that this is Nuwunałxikdimut, a dancer of great repute who accompanies Noökynum and guards his singers. At this point Ano'likwałxais's own song may or [533] may not be sung. It never varies, and is believed to have been handed down from dim antiquity. X himself must be the singer, accordingly it can be sung only when the dancer has a good voice. If this is the case, the marshals request him to perform, and, if necessary, teach him the exact words. X, standing behind the fire, sings alone and unaccompanied, then the singers repeat the song in unison with the beating of their [535] sticks, and Ano'likwałxais herself dances, using, of course, the feminine style. At this juncture the uninitiated must be ex-

-pelled; a Cannibal (II, p. 71) begins to growl and those who are not members of the society leave hastily. 575* 796*

The next event is the burning of the masks. The wearers remove them and lay them on the floor in front of the back-room at the point marked O in the accompanying sketch. Then X asks a friend to help him. The person chosen picks up any two of the masks and carries them around the fire, sunwise, through B, where X is standing, to the point marked A (see Fig. 1). The helper throws one mask on the fire, and as he does so X lifts his arms, as if throwing up some heavy weight, at the same time uttering Aeip, which has a beneficial effect in returning the mask whence it came.

FIG. 1.

As one informant put it: "May you have a safe journey."

The assistant throws the second mask on the fire, and again X throws up his arms and cries Aeip. He crosses to A where he twice repeats the same cry, then returns to B. The assistant picks up two more masks and throws them on the fire at the same place and in the same manner as the two preceding, X also doing as he did before. The masks are taken two at a time until all have been burnt. The explanation given is to avoid the danger of the uninitiated seeing them, but whether or not this is a mere rationalization is doubtful. The Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella do not burn their masks. Next the singers strike up the first of X's songs and he dances, while musicians and audience join in; this is repeated for each of his songs. If it is desired to hasten the ritual, the lengthy singing and dancing is replaced by X giving only a short dance, unaccompanied by music. The Bella Coola do not appear to understand why they dance at this time, although it is said that it makes easy the departure of the masks. [532] [171]

In Kimsquit the ritual of mask-burning is slightly different, [184]

[The Dance of Wila]

"Path Clearers" see to it that no one passes between him and the fire. The uninitiated are not expelled from the house and their curiosity is aroused. Meanwhile the singers prepare songs for X, describing his supernatural patrons, and some kukusiut carpenters are instructed to make in secret ten small pieces of wood, about one foot in length and six inches wide, sometimes half-moon shaped. They cover these with dyed cedar-bark on which they paint the designs appropriate to each being.[11] On the morning of the fourth day,[12] X blackens his face with soot or charcoal, obtained by pouring water on a fire, and dons the usual kusiut costume. A herald then invites the kukusiut to assemble in X's house. Presently they proceed to the lowest house of the village, where the singers beat out the tunes of the "Path Clearers," remembered from a previous year. They dance, while X stands, shifting his feet and moving his apron as if he also wished to perform but was too weary to do so. This is repeated at every house of the village, except that in which the potlatch was held; most of the kukusiut follow the procession, as do some of the uninitiated. Finally, with X last of all, they enter the potlatch house, where foreign guests and many uninitiated have assembled.

575* 796* [532] [302]

In Kimsquit the preliminary four days of watching are omitted, but from this point on, the rites of the two areas are practically identical.[13] As X enters, all the kukusiut who have pounding sticks begin to beat on the floor and the women drone. Without delay, and without attention to the timeless thumping, X begins to dance, sunwise, around the fire, at intervals casting on it particles of eagle down which have the effect of making the supernatural ones above take their places. He calls out intermittently that he can see the beings above sitting down, and a herald repeats his remarks loudly. In Bella Coola the four "Path Clearers" walk close behind X.

[12] It is probable that X must first lie down when Nułtymn's dancer reports that the canoe is at the mouth of the river.

[13] It is uncertain whether the differences in ritual are typical of Bella Coola and Kimsquit, or merely represent variations in individual prerogatives.

[184] [424]

*575 *796 houses. The night's ceremony concludes with a meal and the admonitions of the marshals.

No further description is needed of the rites taking place the next day, that of nusiutālsap, when a second song is composed, again dealing with X's patrons, and wood for masks is cut. The evening's ceremonial does not last as long as that of lsxtāmem.

[532] The next day, qotlm, the carpenters work at the masks, some of which must be finished by nightfall. Late in the *[302] evening both kukusiut and uninitiated prepare themselves [515] by painting and washing; at this time the young men provide pans of warm water for their female friends. As already described, the kukusiut are the first to enter, followed by the uninitiated when all is ready. In Kimsquit they see the masks [184] of at least some of X's supernatural patrons suspended by cords of dyed cedar-bark from a sloping pole that stretches from the floor at the base of the back-room to the cross-beam behind the fire. It is said, although the informant could not guarantee the truth of the statement, that long ago masks had to be displayed at this dance, though it was optional at others. It is a serious and sacred time, one at which frivolity is quite [688] out of place, and the marshals are in readiness to punish any offender. One very old informant told of having seen a marshal strike down and kill a kusiut from another house for holding intercourse with a woman on this night. The heralds *[203] stay near the door, repeating and enlarging on the remarks of [537] the marshals; the fluency of these functionaries always adds appreciably to the success of any Bella Coola rite. On this occasion X and the dancer of Noākqnum must perform, followed by those who have danced in former years, according to the desire of the singers; later in the season, when many kukusiut have performed, the rite may continue almost till dawn, for all must dance. After the departure of the uninitiated the kukusiut eat leisurely, while a marshal addresses them, commenting on the ritual and, perhaps, asking a man

[The Cannibal Dance]

*575 to the woods he is always accompanied by a number of kukusiut
*796 to drive the uninitiated from his path. If it were necessary to perform the full rite just described, it would, in effect, limit 556 this dance to wealthy individuals. One reason why it is possible for a poor Bella Coola to become a Cannibal is that on his second, or subsequent, ceremonial, he can give an abbreviated rite, known as lilstom. The essence of this is *575 that a kindly supernatural being has visited X on earth, saving
*796 him from the perils of going aloft. In this case the ritual 787 closely follows that of a normal kusiut dance and is concluded in four days.

After the nebusam rites of some other kusiut have been concluded, the call comes to X, who responds by growling and biting a few people. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house. Thanks to the friendly intervention of the supernatural being, usually Ałquntäm, X's mental powers are unimpaired so that he does not become infuriated and bites only a few individuals. As with ordinary kusiut rites, the singers [533] beat out a song composed for the occasion, describing the beneficent being who came down to X, and the kukusiut practise and learn it. No other songs are rehearsed on this night, owing to the extreme solemnity of the occasion; it is a Cannibal rite and nothing can take place at the same time.

The next day is nusiutälsap; a second song is composed and a number of the kukusiut are sent to collect wood for [532] masks. Six of these must be constructed representing the fol-[776] lowing supernatural beings:

Ałquntäm, who has benignly interfered to save X from risking the dangers of a trip aloft.

Ałqotleos, a supernatural man-eater from whom the call has come impelling X to eat flesh.

When the call comes, the uninitiated are at once expelled from the Cannibal's house; later he rushes to the graveyard and exhumes one of the meat-filled frames previously buried. Non-members watch with horror as he sinks his teeth in the "flesh." Closely guarded, he is then taken to every house where, if they are bold, the uninitiated peer forth from their bedrooms and watch his performance. He carries part of the corpse in his arms and periodically sinks his teeth in the repulsive mass. As usual, apparent attempts are made to tie him to this earth, but in spite of them he escapes to the upper regions where he remains for an unusually long period. Great efforts are made to reduce him to a state of [824] emaciation, for which purpose he drinks large amounts of water in which cedar-wood has been boiled. When the Cannibal ultimately returns to earth, the cannibalistic incubus is expelled and he at length becomes normal. When dancing, a [535] corpse-eater constantly bends both hands towards the floor in front of him and upwards, as though raising some heavy object towards his face. Then his head sinks towards this, only to be thrown quickly upwards and to one side, with a wild expression in his eyes. The uninitiated are told that this represents the manner in which he lifts a corpse towards his mouth and bites, only to be revolted by its putrescence. He has, they hear, no actual liking for human flesh, but his incubus fills him with an irresistible craving for it. Frequently [532] he wears on his blanket wooden representations of skulls (see Plate 7),[1] symbolic of the corpses devoured.

* 575 * 796 Rarely, a corpse-eating Cannibal kills a slave and pretends to devour his body as a means of impressing the uninitiated,[60] but usually this is done only under the driving force of revenge 567 or jealousy. If a man hears that a near relative, slave of a 648 foreign tribe, has been killed, he often determines to wipe out blood with blood. He consults a corpse-eating Cannibal, and [60] Eating of corpses has long ceased among the Bella Coola; the present tense is used merely for consistency.

[the Scratch Dance]

The ritual of the following day, nusiutälsap, is of the regular kusiut type, so requires only a brief description. A second song is composed, wood for seven masks collected, and the platform is built. As soon as X has returned with the wood-gatherers, he again visits every house, frightening the uninitiated by his wild appearance as he circles the fire, but without scratching anyone. In the evening the kukusiut meet in his house to share in the allotment of work for the mask-making and to practise the songs. The following masks are made:

[532]

Älquntäm;
Sno'olxults Älquntäm, displayed as an ugly-mouthed monster;
Four Holders, similar to those who restrain a Cannibal; Ano'likwolsaix.

After the usual meal the gathering breaks up.

On the next day, qothm, X is still so frenzied that at intervals he visits the various houses with his escort and frightens the uninitiated. After some time these visits cease, though the uninitiated do not know that X has been pacified by seeing the completed mask of Sno'olxults Älquntäm. The kusiut to whom the manufacture of this has been entrusted hurries his work in order that X may be quieted as soon as possible. In the evening the usual qothm rites take place, the kukusiut being often invited before the uninitiated to practise the many songs composed for different dancers; this is done especially near the conclusion of the dances. When the regular ceremonial commences, X is the first to dance, restrained by two couples of kukusiut, as if to prevent him from running amuck among the uninitiated. Afterwards the singers strike up the songs of the kukusiut who have already performed, and each dances. Sometimes, if the rite becomes too protracted, only one song for each is used. Then the uninitiated are sent away and the kukusiut eat together, followed by X dancing to one of his songs. Occasionally, two or three kukusiut are also called upon as part of the ceremony.

[The Scratch Dance]

*575 *796 On the following evening, nebusam, when the uninitiated have been called in, they see Ält̄quntäm standing in the centre of the space behind the fire, wearing a large mask and a blanket decorated with tufts of dyed cedar-bark. Änoºlikwolsaix moves to and fro as she gives her customary explanations, which are echoed by the heralds. The masked representation of Sno'olxults Ält̄quntäm rushes back and forth behind the fire, waving his arms to and fro as if he had an uncontrollable impulse to scratch someone. The four masked Holders move with him, as if to restrain him from dashing among the uninitiated.

"See!" says Änoºlikwolsaix. "That is what they do in the land above."

After gazing upon these wonders for some time, the uninitiated are expelled and the kukusiut perform a dramatic act. As many as possible crowd around Sno'olxults Ält̄quntäm, pressing with their hands against the back of his neck, the seat of [826] the spirit, calling hoip, in an effort to soothe him. This is done four times, without avail; he remains as wild as ever. Then one of the marshals removes the mask, and the same methods are used to try to soothe the wearer. But still they are of no avail. The mask is replaced, and Sno'olxults Ält̄quntäm rushes forth, with the four Holders in close attendance, and followed by a large number of kukusiut. Starting at the lowest house, he enters each in turn, dashing around the fire and startling the uninitiated in the same manner that X had done, but not actually scratching anyone. Non-members cower in terror at this invasion of their houses by a supernatural being. On the return to X's home, Sno'olxults Ält̄quntäm is pacified by the frenzied beating of sticks. The masks [532] are burnt in due course, after which the kukusiut assemble on the sidewalk outside X's house to sing one of his songs and thus further the return of his call to the land above. Sometimes X himself wears the mask of Sno'olxults Ält̄quntäm, more [834] often it is entrusted to another kusiut, but the wearer must

the house to serve as targets, and stones as ammunition. As soon as the call comes, X cries out, begins to throw stones at these objects, and the uninitiated are at once expelled. X is usually led, closely guarded, to every house where he casts more rocks, and may break a number of utensils. Since it is well known that, under normal circumstances, he must never throw a stone, the uninitiated are convinced that he must indeed be animated by a strange power. This being lsuxtämem, the kukusiut gather in X's house during the evening to learn and practise one, or sometimes two, songs for him. If X is a novice, the theme is of his ancestor and the accident which originated the dance; on later occasions it is of his patron and the land above. All Breakers do not have Sänollxumulelts Ałquntäm as patron; some have Snukilmäls, a supernatural being who causes wealth to curl up and come to him. The chorus is the same as for Scratchers, the meaningless words, 'aii, 'aii. It is said that this same refrain is used by the Breakers of all coastal tribes, so that their songs can be distinguished from those of Scratchers only by the words. With the food, presents are given to recompense those on whom X has displayed his prerogative, that is, those whose utensils have been broken. Sometimes canoes and other valuable objects are destroyed by Breakers, depending entirely on their desire to exhibit their right.

Next morning, nusiutälsap, X again becomes frenzied and rushes from house to house, destroying property. Of course this is later paid for, but the uninitiated have no idea that arrangements had been made for the boxes and other objects to be placed in suitable spots. During the day a number of kukusiut are sent to collect wood for nine masks. When members of the society gather in the evening the songs are practised, and the making of the masks allotted. One of these is of Sänollxumulelts Ałquntäm, four are of Breakers in the land above,[a] four of supernatural beings who sing there for the supernatural Breakers, and one of the inevitable Ano'likwo-

in the village announcing that a call has come to X. Meanwhile forty or fifty kukusiut have surrounded X and accompany him as he leaves his home and proceeds to the end of the village furthest downstream. He enters the lowest house, followed by his escort, and stops before the central fire to call out: 575* 796* 787

He circles the fire, sunwise, repeats his call a second time and leaves. The same procedure is repeated in every house in the village, in order from bottom to top, before he returns to his own home. The uninitiated are told that some power has come upon him, but that it is so strange that even he cannot comprehend it. After a short pause, X again sallies forth, accompanied as before, and calls twice in every house of the village. The same ritual is repeated a third time, but on the fourth round, which soon follows, he carries a knife in his hand. Thus it becomes plain to all that X has received power enabling him to have his stomach cut, and the kukusiut show signs of grief at the danger to which their fellow is about to be exposed. Needless to say, the delay in interpreting the call adds to the mystification of the uninitiated, and their wonder at X's power. The heralds do their part by repeating his words with their own comments. [781]

When X finally returns to his own house the heralds summon all the kukusiut to it and the customary ritual of łsuxtämem takes place. The singers beat out and practise a song composed by one of their members for X, the audience listens attentively and then practises it until all are proficient. The theme of every kusiotem song is of the land above and the supernatural beings resident there. The wordless chorus consists of wai'aiye'iu, which the Bella Coola state is the refrain of all kusiotem dances up and down the coast. 575* 796* 533

The second day, nusiutälsap, a second song is composed and a party sent to the forest to bring in wood suitable for masks. In the evening part of the work is allotted[66] and the songs practised. For kusiotem dances, in addition to masks, a 575* 796* 532 [533]

*575 number of puppets is always made. Certain kukusiut, known *796 as änuyex, have in connection with their dance prerogative, the ●532 ability to summon and display supernatural objects in the [424] form of small puppets. These are sometimes patrons, more often [787] not, and include not only beings having human form, but snakes, hummingbirds, and other creatures. By calling his being, an änuyex receives strength which can be transmitted to someone else—so the uninitiated believe—by passing it into [775] the recipient's body. Non-members are told that X suffers [787] death from which he is resurrected by his own powers, reinforced by those passed into him by other members of the society through the transference of their puppets. The most potent "patron-puppet" is the giant toad. It is difficult for a [781] white man to understand how intelligent people, as are many of the uninitiated, can be deluded into believing that the somewhat rudely carved wooden figures which they see moving before them are supernatural beings. Emphasis must again be laid on the awe, mystery, and power of the ceremonies in the eyes of those who do not understand them, and the very great skill shown by the carpenters in making use of hidden strings, trap-doors, and other devices to increase the dramatic effect. Puppets are guarded very carefully by their owners and are usually hidden in some cleft of the mountains. A well-constructed one is used when necessary for many years.

*575 Other preparations must be made for the stomach-cutting.
*796 As in all other kusiut dances, deception is practised and X is not really disembowelled. Instead, a wooden, or copper, frame is made to shield his stomach; over this is arranged the skin of a deer or a dog, cut to cover him from chest to thighs, with even the navel imitated. This camouflage is held in place by his breech-cloth and by a strap passing around his chest. He wears a blanket which conceals most of the fastenings so that the artifice is not noticeable in the dim light of the house. The chief difficulty is to find a dog with skin the same colour as X's.
[281] Many animals are killed, and the fur removed by immersion in boiling water, but sometimes half the dogs of a village must

*575 *796 [217] outside of the house above the central doorway. The middle of the strip is pressed together so that it forms a projecting point, some four inches in length. This sign is a warning to the uninitiated that the kukusiut are working within, and none but a member of the society must enter or even pass on the sidewalk outside the door.[69] The central fire is moved forward to leave a larger space than usual between it and the back-room, and two mattings are raised to form two enclosures, one in each of the rear corners.

All day the carpenters work feverishly, and in the evening the kukusiut are once again summoned. When last performed, the rite on qothm was curtailed, and informants could give only an outline of the proper procedure. It appears that X's two [533] songs are practised, as well as the two mourning songs sung by the chosen women. Then all sit silent as if in grief, while the women occasionally utter mournful ejaculations, dreading the danger to which X will be exposed. At this juncture the uninitiated are summoned; they are impressed by the gravity and obvious fears shown even by the members of the powerful kusiut society. In the tense silence, one of the änuyex suddenly bursts forth:

He reaches up his arms and makes the motions of drawing something towards him from above, while the kukusiut women drone and the singers and others provided with sticks keep up a clamorous beating on the floor. Presently another änuyex does likewise, and so on until as many as wish to do so have drawn down their puppet-patrons. The heralds maintain a running fire of comments to aid in impressing non-members. The customary lengthy dancing of qothm is omitted, and the uninitiated are expelled at once. The kukusiut have the usual

After a short interval, she is answered by the singer in the lower, western, rear corner of the house as follows: 575* 796*

Let there come to earth	the voice of Snitsmän·a	to revive

diyäläkaiqum·ilsutdai
the one who has so injured himself.

The general meaning of this song is obvious, although there are several obscure expressions which serve to increase the wonder and fear of the uninitiated. Silence follows the singing, then whistling is heard and a herald announces that one of the puppet-patrons inserted into X has left him and gone to the region above. Similar whistling announces the departure of others at intervals. When several have done so, it is time for the first to return. A thud, made by a hidden accomplice, is heard on the roof and whistling breaks out afresh. Sometimes the puppet-patron returns to X, but more often to its invoker, and the transference previously enacted is repeated over the body of the dancer who continues to lie as if lifeless. Now and then the uninitiated are invited forward to look at him and they notice that the gaping wound is slowly closing, an easy matter to arrange in the dim light of the house. At intervals the puppet-patrons go and return from the land above, and the proceedings are sometimes enlivened by the owners telling a herald, who in turn informs the audience, what the puppet-patron saw on its journey aloft. Usually each goes and returns four times in the course of the night. Each of the women selected to sing the mourning songs performs once, standing in a corner of the house and waving a wand wound with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. So the long night passes. Towards dawn continuous whistling is heard. This is made by several men with a whistle apiece; each begins to blow as soon as the breath of his partner is nearly exhausted. It is known to be the voice of Snitsmän·a. In Kimsquit, but not in Bella Coola, this is the signal for the entry of the giant toad. Carpenters have made a wooden figure of the amphibian and by means of concealed strings it is

*575 *796 [532] made to hop towards X and bend four times over him. The wound gradually comes together, and the excitement grows ever greater. Those near X cry out that his little toes are moving, as indeed they are, then in succession his fourth, middle, first, and big toes begin to twitch convulsively. It is often difficult to find an assistant capable of moving his toes in the proper order.

"He is alive again," call the heralds, and some of the uninitiated come forward to watch the marvel of the dead man's toes moving.

*575 *796 533 X grows gradually stronger and begins to shake his hands as if he were trying to dance. Then, in a feeble voice, he begins to sing, though the only word which comes clearly is Snitsmän·a, the name of the supernatural woman through whose kindly mediation he has been restored to life. This song has actually been composed by the singers and taught by them to X preparatory to the rite. It resembles a shaman's, since it is assumed that X has practically been made a shaman by the intervention of Snitsmän·a. The singers pretend to be listening intently, and then chant it over, as if they had just learnt it, while X shakes his hands as if dancing. The wailing and weeping of the kukusiut women has given place to joy, and those who had been singing mourning songs dance in time to the music. One after the other the ānuyax who had cast their patrons into X now go to him to recall them. Each bends over him and pretends to extract something by pressure with cupped hands, at the same time crying out hoip, hoip.

Each ānuyax then goes through the motions of casting something up into the air with cries of the same nature; this serves to return his patron to the mysterious region whence it had come. The uninitiated are now expelled and the kukusiut soon follow, without receiving a meal.[11] Those who have taken a leading part in the ceremony usually linger with the marshals

[The Stomach-cutting Dance]

* 575 * 796 533 The singers have also composed a song for each of the änuyax and these too must be practised, while the men dance or remain still as they think fit. Since no uninitiated are present the affair is purely a rehearsal. The words of each of these songs is of the manner in which the patron helped X to survive his ordeal. By this time it is late and the kukusiut disperse after the usual meal and admonitions of the marshals.

* 575 * 796 532 The next day, qothm, the carpenters assemble early in the morning to start work. Since X is entitled to portray any of the supernatural beings who are companions of his patron in the land above, it follows that there is wide variation in his choice of masks to be manufactured. The principal supernatural beings are always shown, and any animals, since all are supernatural, can likewise be displayed. As usual, a few kukusiut are invited at midday to share the meal provided for the carpenters. The number of masks to be provided is often so great that two days or more are necessary for their completion, in which case no ceremony takes place on the night which would normally be qothm; the kukusiut merely gather [533] and again practise their songs.

* 575 * 796 But the day after is qothm. At dusk the kukusiut are called in for a final rehearsal of the songs, and then a summons is sent to the uninitiated, who have been washing and beautifying [515] themselves in eager anticipation. In Kimsquit it is customary [532] to hang some of the masks on a sloping pole behind the fire and [184] the sight of these amazes the non-members. First the singers [781] beat out the song of one of the women mourners and she dances in time to it, while the heralds near the door keep up a steady [535] stream of remarks, encouraging the woman to perform yet [834] more strenuously and to have no modesty about shaking her breasts. Then another of the women dances, followed in succession by the third and fourth if that is the number who sang the mourning songs. Next the änuyax perform, each in succession accompanying the song composed for him. Now comes the central feature of the evening, the performance of X himself. As the singers strike up the shaman's song which he is supposed to have taught them, he appears, supported by two kukusiut, and attempts to dance, but is too feeble to do more than be assisted around the fire, feebly shaking his hands. He retires, but comes forth once more as the singers beat out the song of regular kusiut type composed for him and which his fellows have practised. If two have been composed, he appears a third time. After X has finally withdrawn, the ritual proceeds in the usual manner, by the dancing of every kusiut who has had a call in time to his two songs. It is late before all have danced; then the uninitiated are given a little food and sent away. The kukusiut eat more leisurely, and listen to the admonitions of the marshals. On account of the solemnity of the occasion, their words of wisdom are even more grandiloquent than usual. The following may be regarded as a typical address:

575* 796* [574] 575* 796* 537

"You have done well, ye kukusiut, in thus carrying out the ceremony so admirably. I thank you. You have done well X, you have done as our fathers did. None of you must ever forget the precepts and example of our fathers who have handed down this rite from dim antiquity. Perhaps when we marshals are dead some of you will become careless and want to alter the ceremonial. Do not dream of anything so foolish. The proper method is that which you have just seen. Try no other."

When the marshals have finished, X dances once again, and the weary kukusiut at length disperse.

The next day, or rather later in the same day, for it is long after midnight before the ceremony is completed, is nekusam. Many of the kukusiut assemble in X's house about four o'clock in the afternoon to try on the masks and attend to the innumerable details. A representation of Ano'lîkwolsaix is always prepared, as well as those of Alqantâm, Sxsexkâlaix, and Swuslkâls. The last-named is the "Wise One," "He of Whom Questions are Asked," the supernatural being who decides points of ritual in the dances in the land above. No paint is used on his mask, but a coloured effect is obtained by means

*575 of the darker hue of the inner part of the wood. His nose and *796 forehead are wrinkled as if in deep thought. Masks of many other supernatural beings and animals have been made, in-532 cluding two which are reserved for kusiotem dances alone. The first of these is X's patron, Kulsłkāmidjut, who is capable of having his stomach cut. A face mask is made for him of the usual human type, and in addition a wooden stomach with a slit which can be moved by strings to display entrails painted [796] on a frame beneath. The second distinctive mask is that of Oṣolikts Alqunsām, the herald of Alqunsām. Above his mask is fastened a bird, made of wood, the wings of which can be made to flap by pulling on a cord which runs down under the wearer's blanket. He carries a staff, decorated with alternate spiral bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with another wooden bird likewise provided with flapping wings.
By the time the masks have been adjusted it is quite dark.

*575 The uninitiated, listening from their houses, hear first the *796 frantic, but measured, beating of sticks that always accom-[755] panies a curing ceremony. Then Oṣolikts leaves X's house, followed by all the kukusiut who have danced the same year and accordingly wear dyed cedar-bark collars, and many others as well. The party goes to the bottom house of the village where Oṣolikts pounds on the floor with his staff and cries out:

Xwe . . . .

The kusiut chosen to wear this mask is one who has powerful lungs. The heralds, always in attendance, echo his words and explain to the wondering uninitiated who their supernatural visitor is, and that this is the way he summons the supernatural beings to the dances in the land above. Oṣolikts causes the wings of his birds to flap, the party moves to the next house, and thence in succession to every one in the village before returning to X's. After a short delay the uninitiated hear another crash of the frenzied beating of sticks, and again Oṣolikts parades to every house in the village. On this, his second round, his announcement is:

"I act as herald; prepare to come."

* 575 the enclosure in the opposite corner to that from which they had
+ 746 emerged.

Anamuntsinum. Three or four masked figures appear together to portray these beings. Their function is to remind Alqantám of those whom he should invite to his ceremonials above.

Snunq. As this dreaded monster appears, the uninitiated cower convulsively and the kukusiut women drone. Several [789] masked figures accompany the Snunq around the fire, blowing eagle down over the creature, and Ana'likwelsaix explains to the uninitiated that this is to protect them from the monster. The heralds as usual echo her remarks. After one circuit of the fire, the Snunq disappears into one of the enclosures behind the fire.

Haokas. This supernatural, mythological denizen of the mountains, is in the form of an enormous bird with long beak and bony wings. The mask worn with the disguise is usually [592] about three feet in length, in the shape of a bird's head with long beak. A stick passes from its butt down the wearer's back and is held in place by his belt, thus balancing the heavy, projecting bill (see Plate 8).[1] It is hinged so that the performer can make the mandibles snap together by pulling a cord concealed under his blanket. A good actor, and such is [535] always chosen to represent this creature, bends forward and downwards so that the snapping beak almost brushes the floor; then he rises and pauses like a bird when listening and half startled. Next he runs a few steps, in a mincing manner, thus slowly circling the fire, and ultimately passes from sight into the enclosure other than that from which he has emerged. Several kukusiut accompany the actor, blowing eagle down over him, the women drone and Ana'likwelsaix keeps up a string of comments. After a short pause a second haokas appears and circles the fire with its attendant kukusiut. The same procedure is repeated for a third and fourth.

Alrwolkinum. This is the supernatural herald for Thun- [532] der, the leading kusiut among supernatural beings. He wears

a mask representing a man and carries a stick with which he beats on the floor as he cries out: 575* 796*

"Come, ye supernatural ones. The most famous kusiut of all [Thunder] is about to dance." 776

Thunder. The mask representing this creature is large and of fearsome appearance with hooked beak and overhanging forehead; it is always carried by a man of powerful physique (see Plate 9).[1] A box has been placed beside the enclosure so that, when Thunder first appears, standing upon it, his apparent size is increased. He bends to and fro, and up and down, in an amazing fashion, blowing through his clenched teeth, while Ano'likwelsaix informs the uninitiated who he is, and expatiates on his powers. After twisting and turning for several minutes, Thunder leaps to the floor of the house, and as he does so there sounds a peal of thunder. The uninitiated do not know that this is caused by a number of kukusiut rolling stones to and fro in large wooden boxes within the enclosures at the back. Then he starts to dance sunwise around the fire, bending down and up, shaking himself and stamping violently, his amazing gyrations being constantly accompanied by the reverberation of rolling stones. Escorted by several kukusiut he circles the fire, and after a final stamping and twisting, disappears into the enclosure. In a few minutes he appears again, and repeats his dance. Since no one man is strong enough to carry out this athletic performance twice in succession, the mask has been transferred to another kusiut within the enclosure, but of course the uninitiated are unaware of this. Thunder always comes out four times in all, on each occasion dancing once around the fire. Sometimes four different men perform; sometimes the one who danced first has recovered sufficiently to be able to repeat on the fourth round. The usual explanations by Ano'likwelsaix add zest to the rite. On this occasion the customary dance of Thunder with a fire rattle was omitted. 532● 575* 796* 776 535

Sunwuskas. Twelve of these beings appear together, disguised behind masks representing young girls. They are the 575* 796* 776

[1] [see category 116, p 164 (c) - ANALYST] [532]

*575 *796 776 pre-adolescent children of various supernatural beings in the land above who play together outside Nasmät-a and refuse to allow any man to approach them. As they circle the fire they sing a song of which the theme is their refusal to have anything to do with a man.

[532] The Hermaphrodite. This being wears a mask representing a cast of countenance midway between a "man and a woman," and speaks in a nasal tone difficult to describe. He circles the fire immediately behind the twelve Sqnqnesäxs.

As the young girls are about to disappear into their enclosure, the figure of Sxaiarwax bursts forth from the other and at once the sqnqnesäxs hurry from sight, shepherded by the Hermaphrodite. [532] Sxaiarwax wears a mask representing an ugly and licentious man and carries beneath his bear-skin robe a partly concealed stick. He rushes around the fire as if in pursuit of his quarry, then likewise disappears.

*575 *796 As before stated, the number of supernatural beings shown depends on the wishes of X. On the occasion now being described, the informants agreed that more had been used, but which they were had been forgotten. Sometimes the number is so great that all cannot appear on one night, so the uninitiated are expelled when the marshals think fit and the rite continued on the following evening, making two nalaxam. In either case, after the withdrawal of non-members, the kukusiut burn the masks in the manner already described.

For the rest of the ceremonial season X behaves as if he were recovering from a severe illness. He attends the qatlaw of every kusiut but, like Cannibals, Scratchers, and Breakers, does not blacken his face, sits with them in the rear corners where they are served with food before the other dancers. X is called upon to perform rather late on qatlaw nights and does so in a feeble manner. Towards the end of the ceremonial season, however, he has regained sufficient strength to move around freely, though he still maintains the mien of one who has suffered a terrifying experience. During the following summer he must likewise remain in comparative concealment, and must never gossip or mingle casually with the outsiders. 575* In addition to a band of dyed cedar-bark on his head he wears 796* one around his stomach.

A number of years ago, when the influence of the white man 575* had become strong enough to undermine the old ritual, a Bella 796* Coola ducinow dancer, instead of remaining in seclusion after 688 the dance, ran away to Kimsquit where lived a young woman 177 with whom he was in love. In the old days this would have led to punishment by a third tribe. When the offender wished to return to Bella Coola he was afraid of the wrath of the marshals, but plucked up courage to come back after several months. The marshals nailed him and scratched his stomach with a metal nail so that the uninitiated, seeing the wound, might be led to believe that the man had been severely cut. Periodically the scabs were pulled off to re-enflame the injury and make it appear that a deep gash was slowly healing. The offender, of course, could not protest, since he was a ducinow who had broken the law and was fortunate in escaping so lightly.

The Beheading Dance

Another of the dramatic dances which can be performed by 575* a ducinow is that of having his head pulled off. Like the 796* Stomach-Cutting dance, it is the prerogative of a Kimsquit [924] man named Owiwalrue. He carried out the rite a few years after he had performed the one just described. The main points of ritual being identical for all ducinow dances, minor points already recorded can be omitted. As before, it will be convenient to term Owiwalrue X, and to describe the dance in the present tense.

Early in the summer X informs one of the marshals of his desire to have his head pulled off the following winter. The one consulted discusses the matter with his fellows; in this case no objections were raised as Owiwalrue had already performed a ducinow dance and it was felt that he was reliable. As soon as permission is granted, the would-be dancer asks the best carpenters to meet him in a lonely place in the forest and [532]

575 tells them that he wants a mask made to represent his own
796 face. The purpose for which it is destined is not mentioned, 532 although there is no reason why the workmen, all of them dukaxiut, should not know, as they actually do. X blackens his face a trifle, making it easier to depict, and lies down as model for the carpenters, who at once start chiselling masks. Each works independently, and usually finishes one, or even two or three, in a day. Five or six carpenters are labouring simultaneously, and when the first group of masks has been finished the marshals, and perhaps one or more influential chiefs as well, come to inspect the handicraft. The masks are laid out in a glade of the forest and the marshals make their criticisms.

"No. The nose is too long," they say of one mask, or,

"The cheeks are too full," with regard to another.

It is seldom that one of the first group of completed masks meets with their approval, but the next morning the carpenters try once more, with X again lying down as model. In the evening the marshals again examine the results. Hundreds (probably an exaggeration) are often made before one is found which satisfies every requirement, and if the carpenters fail to produce a realistic portrait, the rite cannot be carried out. The unsuccessful attempts are carefully hidden in the forest lest they should be seen by an uninitiated person. When Onawalcus performed the rite, it was near the end of September before one of the carpenters succeeded in making a satisfactory model.

When the wooden representation has been completed, there is no further doubt about holding the ceremony, and one of the marshals, acting for X, summons the singers and other influential dukaxiut to the secret meeting place for a discussion of preliminaries.[*] At this conference X tells the carpenters what he proposes to give them as presents for the work they have done for him; the concept of "pay" is entirely lacking although it is an essential part of the transaction. The singers are told to prepare three songs for X, choosing as themes the usual kaxiatum facts, with any additional details from the performer's myth which he may give them. The marshals instruct the maker of the successful mask to put hair on it and to attach a neck. 575* 796* 532 [533]

Four days later the same group again meets in the forest and X tries on the mask. When in position it rests on top of his own head with a stick passing down behind his occiput to his waist, where it is fastened by a belt; the general effect is that he has a superimposed head. Minor adjustments are suggested and made and X takes the mask, while the unsuccessful attempts are burnt. The marshals solemnly warn the participants of the seriousness of the rite in which they are about to engage. X conceals the mask with great care in some cleft of the mountains.

At intervals the singers meet and listen to the tunes each has composed, until they decide on the three most suitable, which they practise. [533]

Nothing more takes place until after the winter solstice, when X and the marshals select the exact date for the rite. After a qatlam, the marshals, singers, carpenters, and other kaxiat functionaries remain in the house to rehearse the coming ceremony. The head is placed in position, supported by a framework of reeds which can be separated by strong pressure. When X raises his blanket over his own head, the mask portrait alone is visible, and only the wearer's extra height might cause suspicion. Around his "neck," in reality the junction between X's own head and the false one, is tied a rope, so arranged that when pulled from each end, it slips, contracts on the reed framework, and ultimately tears through it to separate the head from the body.[11] Raw meat and blood have been placed inside the "neck" so that, when the mask is pulled off, it appears as if X's flesh were exposed and he falls to the [11] An old man showed the writer the method of fastening, but I was unable to learn it. The rope, instead of being knotted, is wound within itself so that, when the framework is broken, it comes every untangled. [284]

[The Beheading Dance]

*575 *796 [582] floor. The rope draws through itself, becomes untangled, and the blood stains previously placed on it become apparent. The kukusiut rehearse the decapitation a number of times until every detail is perfect. Shielded by the gloom of the house, one of the carpenters fastens a thin cord to the portrait-mask and practises drawing it gradually towards X, who finally rises as if restored to life by the return of his head. The mask is actually concealed and X stands up at his natural height. Since this is the feat which will be done in the presence of the uninitiated, it must be worked out with precision. When the marshals are satisfied that everything is in good shape they permit the kukusiut to disperse. A similar practice is carried out for the Stomach-Cutting dance if the marshals consider it necessary. The night after the rehearsal the call comes to X, who parades to every house in the village. On his fourth circuit he carries a rope in his hand instead of a knife; the kukusiut weep as they did on the previous occasion, and any uninitiated who have seen or heard of the rite realize the fate in store for X. The next day, nusiutälsap, a number of kukusiut are dispatched for wood, and in the evening some of the work is allotted and arrangements made for singing the mourning songs and for the use of puppet-patrons by the dnayax. The marshals take advantage of the opportunity to harangue their hearers.

"Take heed what you do," they say. "Älqunäm and the other supernatural ones have sent down a powerful call to us. Unless we make strong our spirits we will be unable to bear up under the weight of it."

Qoälm passes without variation from the type already described, and on the following night the kukusiut assemble early for tsäuxam. When they have taken their places, the fire is extinguished; then the uninitiated are called in and guided to their places near the door.[74] After an hour's delay, punctuated by the whistles, the fire is built up and X goes around it four times, while the kukusiut beat furiously with sticks. X calls

[The Fungus Dance]

*575 at O·ḳwi·, near that village, where it has remained ever since.

If X wishes to perform, he informs the marshals of his desire and a suitable time is arranged. On the night of nebusam for some other kusiut, the call comes to X who indicates that it has taken possession of him by uttering a low vocal whistle and peering around as if dazed. Kukusiut accomplices sound whistles from without the house, the uninitiated are at once expelled, and the women drone monotonously. After a few minutes, X walks to the side of the fire nearest the door and [987] again gives his low whistle, still looking around in a puzzled manner. This is repeated a third time at the side of the fire, and a fourth, behind it. Thus the call comes upon him. Heralds inform the uninitiated in the other houses of what is taking place. The kukusiut begin to assemble in X's house, and assist him by the four times repeated frenzied beating of sticks. Next the singers beat out the words of a song already composed for the occasion; the theme for all songs used by Fungus dancers is the land above. The ritual on this night of hsxtāmem is identical with that already described in the earlier kusiut dances.

*575 On the day following, nusiutälsap, there is not the cus-
*796 tomary collecting of wood from the forest. X merely remains •532 quietly within the back-room, visited only by senior kusiut officials and a skilful carpenter. The latter brings a fungus which he has found in the woods; it must be a good specimen of the common semi-circular shelf variety with a clear white surface unspoiled by decay. On this he paints a face, showing eye-brows, eyes, nose, and mouth, and fastens beneath a miniature body made of dyed cedar-bark with grotesque waving legs, terminating in eagle claws (see Plate 10).[1] The total length of the figure is about nine inches. The fungus, with pendant attachment, is fastened near the end of a stout rope of plaited cedar-bark about eight feet in length, so that when this end of the rope is held uppermost, the head of the fungus hangs in a normal upright position. The carpenter starts his work on nusiutälsap and has part of that day as well as all of qotlim and nebusam to complete his task. On the evening of nusiutälsap, the kukusiut are summoned as usual to practise X's two songs. The ritual on this night as well as on the following, qotlim, appears to be of the usual kusiut type although one informant stated that complete silence reigns in order to spread the fiction among the uninitiated in the neighbouring houses that X is waiting quietly to commune with the supernatural beings, and that consequently the customary dancing is omitted. This is probably a modern deviation from the traditional usage.

On the night of nebusam a herald summons the kukusiut to X's house with the cry:

Tcäläts denai nexinkomi dekusiutai
Come to the little kusiut dance.

[539]

This is merely a rhetorical remark since the dance is really one of major import. They enter, and are at once given a small meal.[21] Then the cry is raised for the uninitiated. When they are seated, X appears from the back-room, carrying before him the fungus, held by the shorter end of rope projecting above, while the longer is coiled up behind it out of sight. The kukusiut begin to beat time furiously as X slowly circles the fire. Then, solemnly and carefully, he sets the fungus on the floor where, to the wonder of the uninitiated, it disappears from sight as though it had sunk into the planks. This is, in fact, the case, since the carpenters have prepared a small hole in the floor through which it disappears, leaving only the cord lying on the surface. Any four kukusiut men are called forward to support X and stand, two on either side of him. The dancer bends down, picks up the string easily with one hand and draws up the fungus into sight, taking care not to raise it high enough to expose the longer end of the rope passing through the hole. He lowers his burden and the fungus disappears from sight. X whispers to one of his four assistants and the latter calls out, as if just prompted:

[21] This may be also a modern innovation.

[The Fungus Dance]

*575 from a distance. When one of the participants has speared
*796 the object, it is drawn to shore and carried into the house.
[424] The uninitiated are then called in and enter, often covering their heads with blankets to prevent their spirits being drawn from them. None of the Bella Coola appears to know what governed, in the old days, the choice between these two performances.

*575 The Fungus dance differs considerably from typical kusiut
*796 rituals already described. In part this is certainly due to 178 decay of custom. When the writer witnessed the dance in the winter of 1923-4 it was carried out very crudely by Snunkka'ks, who, unwilling to admit this, was secretive about the proper ritual. Consequently, the performance of the dance was more of a hindrance than a help to the investigator. But even when full weight is given to this circumstance, it is clear that the Fungus dance is peculiar, particularly in the omission of masked figures on nebusam.

*575 The ritual on that occasion was further complicated by the *796 fact that Snunkka'ks has also the prerogative of dancing at 821 an eclipse of either the sun or the moon, and insisted on this fact being brought out in connection with her songs. Four of [424] these were composed instead of the usual two, and the super-[533] natural beings described in them were:

Ałquntäm: under the name of Sunxälotła.

[776] The Moon.

Smaien·a: This was introduced on account of being the [532] place from which the Salmon-Bringer leaps to the sun. A mask representing this place of petrified power is always painted with salmon designs and the blanket of the wearer is decorated in the same way.

The Snunq mouths that act as posts at the ends of the sun's course.

[533] At any eclipse, no matter what the season of the year or

that the whistle of Snitsmän·a is heard. The uninitiated, hearing the sound from the other houses, realize that the kindly being is approaching and are not surprised when a herald presently comes around to announce that X has recovered. In Kimsquit, X's frenzy slowly leaves him, and from this point onwards there are no differences in ritual between the two localities. The singers beat out a new song, prepared in readiness, of which the theme is Snitsmän·a, "The Restorer." X dances to it, and afterwards to any four of the numerous songs previously composed for him. Then he sits down, the first time he has done so, in public at any rate, since the beginning of the rite. Food is next distributed, the marshals make their usual remarks and the kukusiut finally go to bed. From this point on, the ceremony follows the regular kusiut pattern; this occasion, when the riddles are solved, corresponds to Isuxtämem. The successful guesser is dealt with as an initiate in the manner already described. Some of the uninitiated sitting near the youth often realize that he has been prompted by his father, but they regard this as a mere sign of solicitude, assuming that the parent's supernatural power enabled him to solve the problem. It seems clear to them that he could not have known the answer for any length of time because, like others, he had many times guessed and failed. 575* 796* [184] [533]

The next day is nusiutälsap. In the morning all the kukusiut assemble in X's house to learn another new song; this corresponds to the second of a dance which lacks the long preliminaries of this one. A number of kukusiut accompany X to the forest to get the necessary wood for the masks. Mystery dancers have the right to exhibit any, and as many, supernatural beings as they please, hence a large amount of wood must be brought back. In the evening comes the allotment of work. X may do it himself, but usually he asks his father, or some other elderly relative to act on his behalf. Since all his relatives contribute, the actual distribution of labour is not a task in which X alone is concerned. Ano°likwolsaix must be portrayed, and the three best carpenters are entrusted with 575* 796* 532● [424]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

[The Mystery Dance]

*575 masks representing the three successful answers. Little atten-
*796 tion is paid to actual design, and the workmen use their ini-
532 tiative to a considerable extent.[a] One mask always made is that of Snuslaxwai, a being who appears to act as concealer for Ālquntām. As far as could be learnt, if Ālquntām wishes to conceal anything from a human being, such as the hiding-places in a Mystery dance, Snuslaxwai is entrusted with the task. In addition to the usual well-known supernatural beings, X often orders representations of mammals, birds, or fish; he may even ask a man to make a mask without stipulations and then the finished product is as much a surprise to him as to anyone else. There is no relationship between the masks made [556] and the guesses registered. If X is wealthy, the number to be constructed may run to fifty or more. Nusiutälsap concludes in the usual way as soon as all the work has been allotted.

Two days is not long enough for the completion of such a large number of masks, so nebusam must be postponed, and qotlum is correspondingly delayed for four days. In the evening the heralds invite first the kukusiut and then the eager, though [184] fearful uninitiated. They take their places and in Kimsquit, not in Bella Coola, marvel at some of the masks hanging behind the fire, though no explanation is vouchsafed them until the following evening. Presently the singers begin to beat out one of *575 X's songs and he starts dancing violently, only to stop long *796 before it is ended. The musicians quickly change to another; he performs briefly, then ceases; this is repeated for a third tune, and similarly for a fourth, a fifth, and so on. If the preliminaries have been long drawn out, X may have as many as twenty songs and he dances to a fragment of each. After he has performed, the singers strike up the tune of any kusiut

[178] [a] Possibly this disregard for exact portrayal of supernatural beings is a modern degeneration. The Bella Coola of today say quite frankly that they have forgotten many beings used by their ancestors, so have no hesitation in inventing new designs and naming them even for natural phenomena which they consider must be caused by supernatural agency. On the other hand, the burning of masks, which seems to be an old practice, would tend to lessen conventionalization in all but the best-known figures.

who has had a call during the season. Nothing further need be said concerning the ritual of qoθim which follows the pattern already described. 575 * 796 *

During the following day a screen of yellow cedar mats is raised in one of the corners behind the fire; it must be large enough to conceal those who are to wear the numerous masks and give them space to fit them on in comfort. The kukusiut begin to gather late in the afternoon and the usual long discussion takes place as the carpenters decide who shall wear which mask, while the marshals move to and fro. There is no stage-manager to settle disputes, but ultimately order evolves from chaos, and when dusk has fallen the heralds are dispatched to invite any kukusiut who have not appeared. When all is in readiness, a shout is raised for the eager uninitiated, who come crowding in to sit near the door. Ano°likwolsaix moves to and fro, in and out of the enclosure, talking all the time, and telling the uninitiated that presently they will see very powerful supernatural beings. The following account is of the masked figures used when Qoxołän·i last performed the dance; it must again be emphasized that their actual choice depends on the wishes of the dancer and his family, and that the order in which they appear is immaterial. His performance was probably the typical nebusam of a Mystery dancer. [285] 575 * 796 * 532 ● 776

The first to appear are Snuslaxwai and the three hiding-places of X's power. Since they are always uncommon, it follows that no fixed designs are possible, and the carpenters rely upon their own inventive abilities to paint and carve human-like beings. Ano°likwolsaix gives eloquent explanations as the three stalk around the fire and disappear from sight. It would have been equally proper if they had appeared singly.

Next comes Sänolłxmulełts Ałquntäm, wearing a small mask, barely covering his face; above it, in his hair, is dyed cedar-bark puffed out to resemble a wig. He carries a stick with a band of the same material around the middle, and a tuft at either end concealing a nail with sharp, projecting point. Around the fire he dances frantically, leaping into the 776 to pick it up, reverses it, again throws it to the ground, and again lifts it up, all the time gyrating on himself. Finally, with a rush and a leap, he disappears behind the screen whence he came. One of the senior kukusiut, selected for the purpose on account of his knowledge and intelligence, is stationed near the enclosure, and as soon as the supernatural being disappears he explains to non-members who was the visitor. The ever-talkative Ano'iskwoisaix confirms and supplements his remarks.

532 falling, much to the amazement of the uninitiated. He stoops

The next to appear is a mätsqus, a wooden figure about two and a half feet in length with proportions equal to those of a toad. It emerges from the matting at one side of the house, and by means of concealed ropes is made to hop across the floor and return. Behind it there appears a masked male figure carrying a huge wooden hammer; the kukusiut shriek, "Kill! Kill!" and the man strikes at the toad-like creature. It has been made in two sections which can be pulled apart by a skilful manipulation of the ropes; this is done as the hammer descends so that it strikes a bladder filled with red dye in the interior. The colouring spatters in all directions like blood, but after a short interval the animal is pulled together and hops off to the enclosure. The kusiut announcer tells the uninitiated:

"That is a toad from the land above, a mätsqus, which came to visit X. It will soon return to its own home."

After a short pause to let the effect of the last apparition sink in upon non-members, the kukusiut raise the cry:

"Look up there."

A porcupine emerges from a small hole in the matting and crawls down a plank, then turns and goes back, pulled by ropes invisible in the semi-gloom. The figure consists of a real skin carefully stripped off and stretched over a wooden framework. The announcer declares:

"It is a porcupine from above, come to visit X."

representing a man whose mouth is open and whose face is wrinkled in a grin spreading from ear to ear. They go around the fire laughing and playing, rolling on the floor and indulging in all kinds of antics, with constant fits of laughter, so deep that it seems to come from their stomachs. Only one or two men in the community can make the hoarse sound required, and they are always asked to appear as comedians. They are entitled to make witticisms, often of an obscene nature, at the expense of any of the spectators, and the tsalaxist always join in laughter at the victim. Sometimes the singers beat out a short tune and the performers dance clumsily, to the amusement of all. When they have withdrawn, the announcer explains that these two spend their time in the land above playing and jesting. If the preliminaries are long delayed, the clowns may be sent out to keep the audience amused while waiting for the more important beings.

The Hermaphrodite next emerges. As previously described, he dances around the fire, singing in a peculiar nasal twang, intermediate between the voice of a man and a woman. Few men can do this satisfactorily. When the Hermaphrodite has disappeared, the announcer explains that he always remains outside the house in the land above where he plays with a number of women who stay there, and over whom he is lord. His face is that of a woman, his voice that of a woman, but he has masculine characteristics as well.

Then comes Sxaiaxwax, clad in a blanket of evergreen boughs and wearing as ugly a mask as the maker can devise. The pattern varies according to the skill and originality of the carpenter; a common design is that of a snout-like mouth, somewhat resembling a pig with eyes askew. Sxaiaxwax cannot speak, but he dances around the fire spitting, blowing, and making inarticulate sounds in his throat. When he has gone, the announcer explains that Sxaiaxwax is a very evil being who spends all his time trying to seduce girls, especially those who play with the Hermaphrodite outside Nusqulxwaista. With them he never succeeds, but sometimes he comes to this earth

575 with fatal results to his victims. The uninitiated listen and 796 are impressed as Ano'likwolsaix confirms and supplements what has just been told them.

582 After a short pause, the announcer cries, O……,
796 which serves as an invitation and precedes the appearance of every supernatural being. Snung emerges, a man clad in a bear-skin blanket covered with evergreen tufts, and wearing a mask of which the eyes can be made to swing open or shut by the pulling of concealed cords. The monster does not speak; merely circles the fire, terrifying the beholders by his ferocious expression. When the figure has withdrawn, the announcer explains the significance.

The next to appear is a Deer, Sno'olxults Ałquntäm, "The Foolish Son of Ałquntäm." The skin and antlers of a real deer are worn by two men with sticks thrust down the legs to make the representation appear life-like. Two more performers with human masks follow, trying to catch the creature which frisks around the fire and avoids them by escaping back into the enclosure. The announcer informs the audience that this is no ordinary animal, it is a deer from the land above, the son of Ałquntäm. This mischievous creature is said frequently to [578] destroy the back-room in his father's house, hence it is a mild term of reproach to call a person Sno'olxults Ałquntäm.

After the usual delay comes the Varied Thrush, an actor [825] with mask representing a bird. This is considered to be the finest bird songster; the Bella Coola say that all animals, including even mountain goats and halibut, gather to listen to its melody. The performer sings, then withdraws, and the announcer and Ano'likwolsaix explain who has just disappeared.

Next is Wolf, a man wearing a tail and the stuffed head of one of these animals. He circles the fire, howling like a wolf, the performer having been chosen for his ability to imitate that sound. The announcer tells the uninitiated that they have just seen a wolf from Nusqulxwaista, and have listened to it howling for Ałquntäm; as usual, Ano'likwolsaix confirms his statements. Non-members recognize that Deer, Varied Thrush, and Wolf are really persons, but they have no idea who or what they are, while their whole training, combined with the atmosphere with which the whole ceremony is surrounded, makes it easy for them to believe that they are seeing supernaturally endowed animals. If an uninitiated person should voice his doubts, he would be reported at once to the marshals by a spy and forthwith made a kusiut. 575* 796* 532 776 [781]

The next to come forth is a figure wearing a mask representing a man, and carrying a long stick to the end of which is tied a bundle of burning rags. The actor must be able to run swiftly, and, as he dashes at full speed around the fire, the strips of cloth are drawn out into a flaming stream behind him, producing a spectacular effect in the semi-gloom. Ano'likwolsaix explains that this is Shooting Star, a supernatural being who behaves peculiarly and who has, therefore, passed rapidly and without the droning invitation that accompanies the passage of the other visitors. When Qpxolān·i gave this dance, the rags were dipped in coal-oil to make them burn brightly, and one informant thought that this particular supernatural one was, perhaps, not shown in the old days. It must be remembered that details of the ceremony are constantly changing according to the skill and inventive ability of the carpenters. [178]

To the accompaniment of O····· from the announcer and the droning of the women, there next emerge four masked figures representing the four Carpenters. In whatever ceremonial they appear, their masks are the same because they, as master-artisans, are supposed to have fashioned them for themselves. They dance around the fire without singing and disappear behind the enclosure. Ano'likwolsaix explains that these are Mesmesālānx, the Carpenters of Nusqulxwaista.

Now Oqolikts Ālquntām comes forth. He is the herald of Ālquntām who summons the supernatural ones to Nusqulxwaista for the winter ceremonial. He wears a man's mask, surmounted by a wooden bird which can be made to flap its wings by means of a hidden cord, and he carries a staff on top

*575 *796 ●532 776 of which is a similar bird that disappears within the rod by the pulling of a cord. This being is patron of other kukuziut, but this does not debar X from displaying him at his ceremonial. Oqolikts Alquntäm goes around the fire, moving his head in a jerky fashion over his shoulder as if motioning towards something, and Ano'likwulsais explains that he was issuing an invitation on behalf of Alquntäm.

Then the matting is drawn aside to expose the figures of Xemxemälotla, Xemcua, Omqomkikka, Aimälotla, Aiamkikka, Qomcua, Qulaxwoa, Kulilias, *Almäk, and Tlitäpilän-a, each wearing a mask with his distinctive painting on it. Xemxemälotla stands in the centre as chief of the party; he calls out impressively, but without using words, then, as he changes his tone, all the figures turn around sunwise, shouting as they do so. After this has been repeated four times, the matting is restored to place. During this, Kulilias and *Almäk do not remain stationary like the others. The former, wearing good blankets and a mask painted with red to give the appearance of an angry man, moves constantly to and fro among the other beings as if trying to obtain presents from them, while *Almäk, the Kingfisher, hops around in imitation of the jerky motions of that bird, continually poking his head forward and pulling it back. When they have vanished, Ano'likwulsais tells the uninitiated who were the figures they have just seen, and how fortunate they are to be visited by such powerful beings.

After the usual pause, there appears Thunder's herald, Alxwoläxnum, wearing a mask in human form and carrying a staff in his hand. He beats violently on the floor with his rod and cries out:

"Come all ye supernatural ones to the dance of Thunder."

At once Tlopots either rushes forth or sticks his head over the matting and bellows forth:

"No! No! Don't come."

After Alxwoläxnum has circled the fire and retired to the enclosure he can still be heard violently pounding on the floor and inviting the people to Thunder's dance.

J. McGrath E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

Tlapaz follows, wearing a huge mask, and goes around the fire, incessantly saying to all: 575* 946*

"No. No. Don't come."

When he has withdrawn from sight he continues to contradict the herald's invitation. Ae'ltlanhaie explains that Mowalitsaw is herald to the mighty Thunder, while Tlapaz is a jealous-minded individual who does his best to ruin all ceremonials. She adds that he will not succeed on this occasion, and that Thunder will presently appear. 532 776

As evidence of Thunder's near approach there next emerges Rainwater, a masked figure who dances silently around the fire, raising and lowering his outstretched arms. Ae'ltlanhaie hurriedly gives the name of the visitor, then the announcer cries out as loudly as possible: "Thunder the mighty, the leading hacica of all the supernatural ones is coming; he will condescend to speak to the uninitiated."

The women drone and the hakacica beat violently with sticks on the floor, then the meeting is drawn back to disclose Thunder himself, standing on a raised box. He wears a huge mask, with hooked nose and bulbous forehead, which is so heavy that the wearer must have pads of soft cloth to ease the weight against his skin. The upper part of his body is entirely covered with dyed and undyed cedar-bark, his wrists and ankles are similarly adorned, around his stomach is a dance-apron, and in either hand he carries a stick embellished with more bark. Sometimes for a considerable period he does not move from his stand, but remains silent, throwing his arms back and forth towards the corners of the house where a number of men are rattling heavy stones in boxes to imitate the reverberations of thunder; this extension of the arms serves to concentrate in himself his power which is manifest in the sound. When he has sufficiently impressed the audience, he turns around and leaps down; the drums beat, the sticks rattle, the men working the boxes with stones shake them violently, and Thunder shrieks out, all of which, added to the crash with which he has landed upon the floor, makes a colossal din. He dances around the 575* 946* 776 fire, while the women drone out an accompaniment. The mask has only one opening for eyes and nose, blinding the performer, so that he has to be guided by X, and two other kulaciat, though the necessity for their services is not apparent to the uninitiated. The faces of these conductors are blackened and they wear collars of dyed cedar-bark, but no masks; one of them carries some eagle down which he keeps blowing over Thunder's head. To the ignorant spectators it appears as if these guides were really deferential attendants.[*] When the mighty supernatural one has almost completed a circuit of the fire he stops, holds out his shaking arms over it and absorbs power from the smoke; then ressumeds the box behind the screen from which he first jumped. One of the kulaciat thrusts into his hand a perforated rattle containing smouldering cedar-bark. Carrying this (see Plate 11),[§] Thunder again leaps down and dances around the fire, guarded as before by X and two assistants, but this time shaking out burning sparks from the rattle. Now, instead of the droning of the women alone, there is a prodigious racket as he goes around; the drums are beaten, the sticks are rattled, a man concealed on the roof stamps and clatters on the boards, another pounds on loose planking with a heavy stone, while Thunder himself keeps calling out in a booming voice. Again he pauses to absorb power from the fire before retiring behind the screen, which is then drawn. The announcer cries out:

"The fire kusiut of the supernatural man has been with us; his fire is too wonderful for us."

[532] He drawn and there appears a masked figure of Sipalumlin. This being dances around the fire, without speaking, but at intervals drenching the audience with water from a dish which he carries. When he has completed his circuit and withdrawn, Ax'ilkwalmin discourses upon Thunder, informing the uninitiated that his fire-rattle is the bird of the lightning, a mysterious creature about which little is known. He adds that

Sipalexnów is the rain that accompanies a thunder-storm, hence the water with which the audience was soaked. 575*

There next comes forth an actor wearing a man's mask and carrying in his hands a sounding-board and beating-sticks, as if he were a singer, ready to perform at a ceremony. He arranges these in place, constantly glancing back over his shoulder towards the enclosure, then calls, and out jumps Nieqs, wearing a mask which makes his face appear long and very narrow. He shuffles his feet, moves his head from side to side, sways his body to and fro as if he were starting a spectacular dance, finally gyrates wildly for a very short period, without accompaniment from the man who preceded him, and then goes back to the enclosure instead of circling the fire. The apparent singer picks up his equipment and follows his principal out of sight. Ăwĕ'lĕwulnaic explains that Nieqs is a most spectacular supernatural dancer, who was unwilling to give an exhibition of his full skill on this occasion. 796* 776 [532]

Meanwhile preparations have been made for the second appearance of Thunder. The large mask is so heavy and constricts the breath to such an extent that very few men are strong enough to bear it for more than two dances around the fire. The first wearer has now transferred his disguise to a second man of about the same build, and when the matting is again drawn aside, it is to disclose Thunder standing on his raised box as before. Often a few variations are introduced; instead of extending his arms to attract his power, he may simply revolve with waving arms and turning head. When ready, he signals to those with drums and beating-sticks, then jumps down with a crash which is echoed by all the noise-making contrivances in the house. Thunder dances around the fire much as upon his first appearance, and inhales strength from the smoke of the central fire before returning to the raised box. He receives the rattle containing smouldering bark, and once more circles the house; after that he withdraws and the matting is pulled into place. Sipalexnów comes forth and drenches the audience with water, but Ăwĕ'lĕwulnaic does not [532] speak on this occasion as the explanation has already been given.

After a short pause the announcer calls impressively: "Take care! The kaukas are coming."

From within the enclosure there is heard the clacking of beaks, and presently a kaukas backs out. The mask, about three feet in length, is that of a long-beaked bird, of which the lower mandible can be made to strike against the upper to cause the snapping noise. The wearer has little clothing but much dyed cedar-bark which conceals the stick that runs from the mask down his back to counterbalance the weight of the projecting beak. Another kaukas likewise comes out backwards, then a third and a fourth. The four dance around the fire, snapping their beaks and uttering their cry, Hau, kau, kau, in unison to the stamp of their feet on the floor. X, with three assistants, accompanies them, apparently out of respect to the supernatural visitors and to guard the uninitiated from them in case they should become ferocious, but in reality to direct the steps of the actors whose cumbersome masks prevent them from seeing where they are going. A touch from one of the guides, or even the sound of his voice, is enough to tell the gyrating performer in which direction to move. When the kaukas have disappeared, Ăw'ĭkwulnaix explains who the visitors were.

Next appears a Snail. The mask used is human in form, and the painting may or may not indicate the being represented. The wearer proceeds very slowly around the fire, turning neither to right nor to left, and withdraws. Ăw'ĭkwulnaix explains that this is a Snail from Nacpulwaxix which has come to visit X.

Another man-like figure now comes forth, his mask painted to represent a fish. Like the Snail he circles the fire without any special type of dance and withdraws. This is the Red Rock Cod, a fact which Ăw'ĭkwulnaix makes clear to the uninitiated.

Finally, the time comes when the last supernatural visitor has retired from sight. Ano'likwolsaix gives her customary dance, her head bent as if she constantly wished to rest it on someone's shoulder, and her opposite arm waving violently. After one circuit of the fire she withdraws from sight behind the matting. Then the marshals tell the uninitiated to withdraw, and the growling Cannibals hurry them forth. The evening's ceremonials conclude in the usual way, except that the masks are not burnt. 575* 796* [776] [532]

The length of time required for the figures to appear and perform is so great that nebusam can seldom be completed on a single night. When the marshals decide that it is too late for further drams, they can call a postponement at any time; the uninitiated are told to withdraw and the kukusiut disperse shortly afterwards. The following evening they are recalled and the ritual is carried on from the point where the break was made. In this account it has been assumed that it is possible to complete the display without postponement.

Four nights later everyone is called back once again. The kukusiut first take their places, and then the uninitiated are summoned. The ritual on this occasion is identical with that just described for nebusam with the same promenade of supernatural beings and the same explanations by Ano'likwolsaix. After the uninitiated depart the masks are burnt, two at a time, in the manner previously described, this being the last event in the Mystery Dance. [532]

THE DANCE OF Winwina

Nuskyum is not, according to Bella Coola mythology, the only bringer of salmon to the river, nor is he the only one whose action has been dramatized as a kusiut dance. A similar purveyor of fish is *Winwina who comes every year to Bella Coola. Boas (p.38) has recorded the origin myth connected with the rite, and states that the movements of this being influence the duration of the kusiut season; this observation was not confirmed. Winwina is supposed to return from the 575* 796* 776 825 184 824

though perhaps you cannot hear him because Winwina is making so much noise." 575* 796*

The meaning of this statement is difficult even to surmise and the Bella Coola themselves appear to be ignorant of it. It is said that the words are archaic. The kukusiut women at once begin to drone and the uninitiated flee, sometimes falling over one another in their eagerness to escape from the house, for the whistles are sounding and X has had his call. An eloquent kusiut stands beside him, apparently listening to him, and at intervals whets the curiosity of the audience by saying:

The person who appears to be listening is one who knows the story of Winwina and as soon as X has stopped, he proceeds to relate it to the audience,[11] as if he had just learnt it from the dancer. It is possible that even some of the kukusiut are deceived, but in any case they are so accustomed to acting that they practise it even when no uninitiated are present. The singers are especially attentive and presently begin to strike out a new song composed for the occasion. The theme is of Winwina himself and his bird crew, and of the lazy Kāmālālkł; the audience listens eagerly and practises the composition. Afterwards food is distributed amid admonitions of the marshals as is customary on the night of Isxtāmem. [533]

Next morning a second song is practised for X, and then a number of kukusiut go with him to the forest to bring in the wood required for the ceremonial. In the evening members of the society assemble in X's house for the allotment of carpentry tasks. The most important requirement is a canoe, shaped like a bird, and with bird figures as members of the crew. Considerable ingenuity is displayed in the manufacture of this; it is large enough to fill most of the rear part of the house, and, being bottomless, can be made to move by men concealed within. Several carpenters usually work together at this task. X also orders wooden replicas of the different 575* 796* 532

[The Dance of Winwina]

*575 *796 532 kinds of salmon captured by Winwina. In their efforts to make realistic representations, the artisans often use the skins of steel-head salmon, the only variety obtainable in winter, stretched over wooden frames, and painted. Various women are asked to make imitations of berries captured by the Hermaphrodite. In each case X requests one woman to make a certain berry, root, or bark used for food, and so many are needed that he often becomes weary from constantly calling out his requirements. As on other nusiutälsap, the songs are practised, food is served, and the usual ceremonies occur.

The next morning, that of qotlim, the carpenters, both men and women, start early at their work. The method of making the salmon has already been described, but a word should be said about the berries. They are made of dyed cedar-bark, undyed cedar-bark, and snow-berries, the only material available in winter. The workmanship varies enormously; some realistic articles are turned out, others are exceedingly crude. In the evening booth kukusiut and uninitiated are summoned to X's house for the usual protracted ceremony of qotlim night.

*575 *796 825 Nabusam follows the next day. The wooden salmon and berries are placed in a convenient spot behind the fire, and in the evening X asks some one of the senior kukusiut to assist him in their display. Sometimes one of the marshals undertakes this duty, and at any rate they have to express their approval of the dancer's choice. The kukusiut are the first to assemble, and when the last details have been arranged the uninitiated are called in and marvel at the canoe behind the fire. The kusiut chosen to assist X stands beside it, holding the wooden spring salmon in his arms, its head upstream.

"What is it?" he asks the uninitiated. "If you recognize which salmon it is you will be successful in catching that kind next summer."

The uninitiated are thus urged to guess, but fear of the kukusiut acts as a deterrent, and it is often some little time before a plucky youth calls out which salmon he thinks it to

on the floor with a stick and the women sing with him. Food is then given to all and the people disperse. 575* 796*

It will be noted how greatly this dance differs from the usual kusiut pattern, especially in the omission of a nebusam when masks are used. Instead of the ritual just described, X has the option of using another, similar to the customary kusiut type. The following ritual has not been carried out for many years so it is probable that many details have been overlooked. No information was obtainable about the motives governing X's choice of dance. [424]

As in all kusiut dances, the first essential is to select a suitable time, a matter of arrangement with the marshals. The night chosen for the coming of the call is often the nebusam of some other kusiut, and the uninitiated are at once expelled. The kukusiut gather in X's house, where the singers beat out the song composed for the occasion, describing Winwina and his crew, especially the four Kāmālālkl who were not only too lazy to capture any booty, but wanted to sleep all the time and could be roused only by being drenched with cold water. The audience listens attentively and then practises the song; X often dances but it is not important since no uninitiated are present. There are no unusual features in the ritual of this night of łuxtāmem.

The next day is nusiutālsap when the wood is brought in for masks, the making of which is allotted in the evening. Five only are required; one of Āno°likwolsaix and four of Kāmālālkl. The ritual is of the ordinary type both on this night and on qothm. [532]

When the uninitiated are called in on the evening of nebusam they see X standing behind the fire, as if to guard the two masked figures standing on either side of him. Fluent speakers are selected to wear these masks of Kāmālālkl and they enliven the proceedings by their arguments.

"I captured the sockeye salmon," says one.

"You liar!" replies another. "You were asleep. It was I who seized the sockeye salmon."

[the Dance of Mother-Nature]

season, subject to the usual consent of the marshals. No description need be given of the coming of the call and of the ritual of lsuxtämem. A large amount of wood is required, and on the night of nusiutälsap the many carpentry tasks are allotted. A large masked wooden figure is made to represent Mother-Nature herself, two more of the elderly women who attend her, and one of the inevitable Ano°likwolsaix. Besides, masks must be made of almost all the flowers and the trees, their number only limited by X's willingness to reward the carpenters. It is said that formerly as many as three hundred masks were sometimes ordered. 575* 796* 824 [532]

No detailed description is required for qotlm, but the ritual on nebusam differs from that of all other dances. Early in the morning a number of kukusuit gather in X's house where the carpenters decide on two old women to wear masks representing hags of great age and ugliness. A number of kukusiut accompany them to the bottom house of the village where they call out: [532]

"We are in great trouble. Our daughter's child is long overdue. If you know of any good medicines, will you not give them to us for her?"

The kukusiut drone when they see and hear these supernatural visitors, and many of them give medicines to the old women to increase the realistic effect. This is repeated in every house of the village.

That night when all is ready, the uninitiated are called in and take their places in the two corners near the door. They see in the central position behind the fire a large wooden figure wearing the mask of a woman in the pangs of labour with enormously distended stomach. She is Nunuoska, Mother-Nature, though the uninitiated do not know this as yet. She lies on some raised planking; slightly below her are two old women carrying sponges of dyed and undyed cedar-bark, as if they were midwives prepared to wash a new-born infant. Two matting enclosures have been constructed, one in each of the rear corners of the house, large enough to hide the per- [532] [844] formers who are chosen for their small stature. Ano°likwolsaix stands up ready to explain as usual. One of the actors now comes forth from beneath Mother-Nature's stomach, as if born of her, wearing a mask surmounted by a carved stick representing the leaves of the willow. The nurses handle the performer, as if washing a new-born child, and announce:

"It is a boy, Willow Leaves," just as a midwife might state the sex of an infant.

Willow Leaves dances around the fire, at intervals saying, "I am Willow Leaves."

Ano°likwolsaix adds her comments: "Yes. There is Willow Leaves, see him."

The masked figure goes into the matting enclosure out of sight. The next plant to be born is Gooseberry, for whom the same procedure is carried out, before he, too, disappears. In succession, a few minutes apart, come Nettle, all kinds of Grass, and Western Skunk Cabbage. Each is washed and the sex announced; then the figure dances and Ano°likwolsaix comments as before. A good dancer is always chosen for the next figure, Black Cottonwood, who is "born" in the same way, but instead of vanishing into the enclosure remains dancing to and fro on the upper, upstream, side of the house. After him comes "The Dancing Tree," the American Aspen. An agile man is likewise chosen for this part and he remains dancing back and forth on the lower, downstream, side. Ano°likwolsaix announces, amid breathless interest: "The South Wind is coming."

This figure enters the house by the front door, wearing the mask of a handsome young man. He goes to Nunuoska like a doctor called in to assist, and when he stands up, her face appears like that of a happy woman who has just given birth. The uninitiated do not realize that a new mask has been put on Mother-Nature while her face was hidden from their sight. The South Wind then retires to the lowerside of the house, where he dances to and fro near Aspen, at intervals going up to his patient. In rushes the North Wind, but he is too late to accomplish his design of destroying Mother-Nature in the act of delivery, and he remains dancing to and fro on the upper side of the house, not far from Black Cottonwood. The advent of the South Wind has helped Mother-Nature, so in close succession there follow masked figures, representing the plants, trees, and shrubs known to the Bella Coola. Those first to appear, prior to the coming of the South Wind, have been early ones in the order of their showing signs of green; afterwards there is no fixed sequence, except to follow as closely as possible that of their appearance in the spring. When Black Hawthorn is being born there is great difficulty; he kicks, squirms, and cries, requiring the assistance of both attendants and the South Wind. As soon as his name is announced the meaning of the trouble becomes plain; it is because the fruit is bitter and causes griping in the stomach. The performance is a lengthy one; the same masks appear repeatedly, but the painted stick representing the flower or leaves is changed. Through the long period of their birth, the Willow, Aspen, North and South Winds continue their dancing, the North Wind trying at intervals to reach Mother-Nature, but always repulsed by the watchful South Wind. To the uninitiated it appears wonderful, perhaps miraculous, that so many beings can be hidden in so small an enclosure; in reality, no more than fifteen actors are used, they simply change their masks and reappear. The last masked figure represents After-birth, a moss which does not appear until late in the season after all the other plants have come to life. Instead of going around the fire, this figure hides quickly by lying down out of sight. 575* 796* 824 532

The uninitiated are sometimes sent away at this point, at other times they are allowed to wait to hear the meaning of the whole ceremonial. X asks an able kusiut to act as orator. This man explains that we would have no food if the South Wind had not been able to drive away the North Wind before he hurt Mother-Nature as she gave birth to the plants, which form so important a part of the food supply. If not already expelled, the uninitiated are sent out at this point and the 575* 796* [824] second of the whole performance. The ritual is of the regular type with the composition and practising of a song. 575* 796*

During the evening of the next day, nusiutälsap, the usual carpentry tasks are allotted. Only three masks are required, one of Ano°likwolsaix and two of supernatural beings termed Mulelsta, as if they had the power to lengthen or curtail the lives of human beings. The ritual on qotlim warrants no special description. Late in the afternoon of nebusam the kukusiut assemble in X's home and the uninitiated are presently startled to see them all rush forth with three masked figures in their midst. Assuming, of course, that these are supernatural visitors, the frightened non-members retreat to their houses where they peer forth at the figures as they parade up and down the shore beside the river. They can easily recognize Ano°likwolsaix, but not her two companions whose faces are painted black and white, and who have projecting, snout-like mouths. After this promenade and a certain amount of dancing, the party retires to X's house whither the uninitiated are presently summoned. The two Mulelsta dance around the fire while Ano°likwolsaix explains their power over the lives of mortals. The kukusiut soon ask the uninitiated to withdraw and the ceremony ends in the customary manner. [532] [532]

X must perform this full ritual at least once after obtaining his kusiut name with respect to it, but on later occasions he can, if he so desires, limit himself to the second part of the ceremony with the appearance on earth of the Mulelsta. [424]

THE DANCE OF THUNDER

According to Bella Coola belief, the supernatural ones in the upper land resemble human beings in performing kusiut dances. Like mortals, some of those above are more powerful and more feared than others, but the senior kusiut among them is Thunder. Corresponding to the prowess of his patron, the dance of his human protégé is one of the most important kusiut rituals. The essential feature of it is that Thunder calls all supernatural beings to witness his dance, and in consequence 575* 796* 424 776

verbal to physical arguments, and one occasion is remembered when the latter was shoved from a canoe into the river. 575* 796*

In the evening the kukusiut are first called in, to be followed by the uninitiated in due course. Thunder dances in the manner already described, though, if possible, with even more vigour and abandon than when he was only one of the performers in the Mystery dance. As recorded in that dance, he performs twice, on the second occasion carrying a rattle containing burning shreds of cedar-bark. After each circuit of the central fire, Rainwater appears and drenches the audience, as rain accompanies a thunder-storm. The dramatic skill displayed is always impressive, and a touch of comic realism is added by the reiterated remarks of Ṫloqots who does his utmost to belittle Thunder. 776 [522]

The time-beater for the expert dancer, Nixṗs, appears after Rainwater. When the ceremonial is carried out with care, he wears a skull mask to show that he is a ghost who has come from the land below in answer to the call of Ałxwolätnım. As he beats time he sings a wordless song of the dead. The skill of Nixṗs as a dancer is due to the fact that he is a yearling mountain goat among supernatural beings. The uninitiated look forward with eagerness to witnessing a remarkable dance, but after a few violent contortions the performer withdraws, followed by the musician. [532] [533]

It would be needless repetition to enumerate all the supernatural beings who follow, so mention will be made only of those who are considered especially appropriate to the Thunder dance and who are accordingly shown on almost all occasions. Winter Wren is a masked figure which hops about in an agile manner similar to that of the bird on this earth, and Rabbit likewise imitates the movements of an earthly rabbit. Ano°lik-wolsaix explains to the uninitiated that Thunder would like to taste the flesh of mortals but that he is too big and too hot to approach them, so sends Mosquito as his messenger. The masked figure representing that insect carries a stick about one foot in length beneath his blanket, and runs around the house [532] [825]

[The Ghost Dance]

*575 *796 X's, where he is soothed by the four times repeated frenzied beating of sticks and his call returned whence it came.

[787] During the rest of the ceremonial season X becomes mad at intervals and displays his insanity by rushing to every house and throwing dirt and sand. His kukusiut escort is always with him, and the procedure is identical with that already [424] recorded. X makes no recompense for the damage inflicted, so it is probable that his fellows do not regard his dance as an unmitigated pleasure, but nothing can be done to deter him from exercising his prerogative.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CHARMER

*575 *796 776 Although the Bella Coola are probably as moral as members of any other tribe, they enjoy humour of an obscene nature, and a dance which never fails to provide amusement is that of the Supernatural Charmer. The patron of this is Sximsximdt, [522] a beautiful, unmarried, feminine being who is also termed [831] Aliqmän·i and Nuuxkmälsaix. She is thought to disregard the efforts of her supernatural relatives to restrain her, and comes to this earth where she bestows her favours not only on human beings, but on animals. Her protégé at Kimsquit is a young [557] man, Łälaiuks, at Bella Coola, a young woman, Kwalākmus; [562] like all other kusiut names these can be used either by men or women. It is said that Łälaiuks's prerogative is derived from [424] the experience of an ancestor in past ages, whereas that of Kwalākmus was initiated three generations ago by a very powerful chief. The ritual in each case is identical, so the dancer [533] can be referred to as X. Each has the prerogative of singing not only of Sximsximdt, but also of the being known as Winwinhmak. [532] Many masks are required at the nekusam of either of these beings, so it is customary for X to perform with respect to Sximsximdt one year, and to Winwinhmak at the next or a subsequent ceremonial season, though the actual songs always refer to both patrons.

*796 *575 When X wishes to dance he consults the marshals, obtains their consent, and then makes final arrangements on, normally, the qoθlm of another dancer. Next night the call comes to him in the ordinary manner, and the heralds go through the village announcing what has taken place. The uninitiated are expelled at once from X's house and the kukusiut presently assemble to listen to the song being composed by the singers. The theme is of Sximsximdt; how she came down from above and travelled all over the world shamelessly luring men and animals; how various supernatural beings tried to restrain her without success; how she went to the house of Qeil and was trying to seduce several young men living there when Winwintmak appeared and endeavoured to make her behave herself, but without avail. The song then describes Winwintmak who seems to be a warm wind, engaged in a never-ending duel with the cold winds.[21] No detailed description is required for the ritual of nusiutälsap, when a second song with the same theme is composed, or of qoθlm, since these follow the typical kusiut pattern.

575* 796* [533] [776]

During the afternoon of nebusam, the kukusiut gather in X's house to try on the completed masks and make the final arrangements. Whistles sound so continuously that the uninitiated remain either within their own homes or near them, ready to hide in the bedrooms if necessary. Within X's house the carpenters are supervising the choice of masks; a fluent man able to speak like a woman is, as usual, chosen to represent Ano°likwolsaix; another with similar qualifications is selected for Sximsximdt, while the other masks can be worn by almost anyone. Presently a strange procession leaves X's home and enters the lowest house of the village where the uninitiated hasten into the inner rooms, but watch proceedings through cracks between the boards. First comes X himself, his face blackened and wearing the usual collar. He remains standing near the door and watches as Sximsximdt enters and slowly proceeds around the central fire; she wears a mask representing a young and beautiful woman. Behind her come her lovers,

[532]

[21] Definite information concerning the identification of Winwintmak could not be obtained.

[The Dance of the Supernatural Charmer]

*575 each wearing the mask of a man and each with the clothing
*796 and distinctive marks of a particular tribe: Tsimshian, Haida, [532] Bella Bella, Rivers Inlet, China Hat, Kitimat, Fort Rupert, Smith Inlet, Cowichan, and as many more as X has wished, not forgetting Bella Coola itself. On at least one occasion representations of a white man and of a Chinese were used. Sometimes instead of one, there are two of each tribe. Each figure pretends to be pursuing Sximsximdt and keeps up a running fire of complaints:

"She left me for a worthless man; oh! how unhappy I am," says one, and another adds:

"Alas, I enjoyed her only once."

Each uses his own imagination in making comments, frequently drawing on personal experiences with faithless women. Ano°likwoisaix explains everything, and the heralds echo the remarks. Sximsximdt looks around for a handsome young kusiut woman and says to her:

"How many men have known you?"

The heralds repeat the question and tell the woman not to be bashful, but to speak the truth. It is considered excessively [522] funny for her to answer a number in the hundreds, even more
[831] than the tale of Sximsximdt's lovers. This is a time when obscene remarks are allowed and, indeed, expected. A short distance behind the hurrying procession of those who have [532] loved Sximsximdt and are still allured by her, comes a supernatural being disguised under the mask of an old man. He is her father, who keeps giving her good advice and begging her to forsake her evil ways, but she pays no attention to him.
*575 Finally, just as she is about to leave, there enters an old, old
*796 man with white hair and a wrinkled face; he totters in leaning heavily upon a stick and calling to the woman to wait for him.
522 She heeds him not, but goes out of the house while he staggers feebly around the fire, voicing his complaints and his appeals. Ano°likwoisaix explains that he is Simptcus, who fell under the spell of Sximsximdt long ago in his youth, and for whom her beauty had such a fatal attraction that he has followed her

her house while the singers compose a new song. The theme is of her patron, the young male being, Kwat·iwal·a, "The Big One." It describes how he came from above and went far and near over the earth in lustful pursuit of women, how each victim fell in love with her seducer so that she followed him in all his wanderings, how Loon befriended him, and how he exchanged his blanket for a covering of abalone-shells. 575* 796* [533] [776]

On nusiutälsap when the kukusiut as usual go to the forest, they bring back not only wood for masks but also the trunk of a large cedar tree, at which the carpenters work during the two succeeding days. On nebusam a parade occurs of the supernatural beings similar to that in the dance of the Supernatural Charmer, but the masked figures represent women, not men, of the different coastal tribes. Kwat·iwal·a leads the procession and pays no more attention to his mistresses than did Sximsx-imdt to her would-be lovers. There is the same licence for lewd remarks, of which Kwat·iwal·a takes full advantage when he calls the attention of the young men to his following, and asks them how many mistresses each has had. [532] [831] [522]

In the evening the uninitiated are called to X's house where the first object they see is the tree-trunk, converted by the carpenters into an enormous bird. Wooden wings and a loon's head have been provided and the whole is painted in imitation of a loon's plumage. Kwat·iwal·a is in evidence, wearing a bird disguise. Presently a matting enclosure in one of the rear corners of the house is thrown open, and the uninitiated see the throng of his mistresses who rush forth, almost coming to blows in their eagerness to reach their seducer. Ano'likwoisaix stands on one side and explains the significance. After the mock combat has lasted for a few minutes, a Cannibal begins to growl and the uninitiated hurry out. The ceremonial then concludes in the usual manner. [532]

This dance differs from all other kusiut rites in one respect, since the call can come to X several times during a single ceremonial season. Of course there is no compulsion; she uses her own discretion as to whether she dance more than once, [424]

*575 *796 [424] but a proud and energetic dancer sometimes repeats a ceremony three or four times.

THE SUN DANCE[24]

[776] [821] One of the forms in which Ālquntām appears is that of the Sun, and in that case he is referred to as Sinxālotla. Considering the importance of this deity, it is rather surprising that the kusiut dance of which he is patron is not more impressive. Efforts were made to obtain full details of the ceremonial from several informants, but only a number of incidents and a bare [124] outline could be obtained. In part this was due to the fact that none of the informants[25] were themselves protégés of Ālquntām, but this is not in itself sufficient to explain the comparative unimportance of the dance, since full accounts were obtained of other rituals from those who did not own them.

Nothing was learnt of the origin of any of the Sun dance [424] prerogatives, except that ancestors of the owners obtained them [551] from Ālquntām. It is a common right, and kukusiut having Ālquntām as patron are found in every village, among them being Qoxolān·i of Tcimotl, and Nexnexliwalaix of Nusqalst. As far as could be ascertained, the ritual of various Sun dance performances is identical, so one account will suffice and the dancer can be termed X.

Like other kusiut dancers, X can perform at any time during the ceremonial season, subject to the approval of the marshals. The call comes to him in the normal manner, the uninitiated are expelled, and the kukusiut gather in his house to practise the songs which the singers have just composed. The theme [533] is of Ālquntām, describing his manifold functions, and particu- [776] larly that of guiding the Sun. The following day a second song with similar theme is composed, and in the evening the tasks are allotted for the manufacture of masks. Four are required; a large one representing Ālquntām himself, one of [532] [171]

[24] Needless to say, no connection or similarity is implied with the dance of the same name in other areas.

[25] Except one man who had forgotten all details since his conversion to Christianity many years before.

[The Sun Dance]

Ano°likwolsaix, and two of the supernatural Clowns. In addition a white disk, about four feet in diameter, is ordered with a human face in the centre; this represents the Sun with Alqun-tām. No detailed description is required until the night of nekusam. 575* 796* [532]

The kukusiut gather in the dusk and summon the uninitiated as soon as all is in readiness. On entering, they see the huge and imposing figure of Alquntām standing in the centre of the space behind the fire, flanked by a number of the most important kukusiut as if to pay respect to him. X stands immediately behind, repeatedly throwing one arm over Alquntām's head and crying hoip to soothe the visitor. The two Clowns move to and fro, all over the house, making what remarks they like as if they were spoilt children. Ano°likwolsaix stands on one side, explaining the meaning of it all, and giving the names of the supernatural beings represented. Suddenly the white disk appears against the back wall near the roof, slowly passes sunwise across the house, and disappears. The uninitiated recognize that it is not the Sun, but to them it seems miraculous that this body can move as it does, and they easily accept Ano°likwolsaix's explanation that this is the way Alquntām crosses the heavens. They do not know that for the last two days the carpenters have been exercising their ingenuity in arranging cords so that the object can be drawn across smoothly and steadily. Again the sun "rises," and crosses the back wall, only to disappear from sight. This is repeated twice more, making four times in all. It is said that sometimes the Sun is made to spin just before it "sets," but the method could not be learnt. At this juncture the uninitiated are sent home and the proceedings conclude as usual. [522] [821]

In addition to performing in the customary manner, X is required to dance on other definite occasions, without the coming of a call. According to some informants, X must sing of his patron at the beginning of the ceremonial season, coincidently with the protégé of Nełkynum. This is probably correct but details were unobtainable. In any case, when the [424]

[The Moon Dance]

*575 No detailed description is needed for the ceremonial on *796 either nusiutālsap or qothm. On the evening of the former day 821 the masks are ordered; one for Asiutānem, who appears to be confused with the Moon itself, one for each Aiqwaiust, one for [532] each Snitsmān-a, and one for Ano'likwolsaix.

Late in the afternoon the kukusiut assemble in X's house to see that everything is in good shape. A large mat has been [532] spread across the back wall of the house and on it a disk representing the Moon, with a human face in the middle. After the usual discussion the uninitiated are called in. Each Snitsmān-a remains standing alone in the two back corners of the house, while the two Aiqwaiust are in the central space behind the fire, constantly waving their arms to and fro. Suddenly the Moon itself appears against the matting. A carpenter, concealed behind the screen, directs its course so that it moves in a short arc across the background and disappears; Ano'likwolsaix explains to the uninitiated that this is the track of the new Moon, low down on the horizon. A second time it "rises," and moves across in a longer and higher curve, which Ano'likwolsaix says is the longer orbit of the waxing Moon. On its third course it is still higher, and on its fourth appearance it moves across the full width of the house near the roof, which Ano'likwolsaix describes as the course of the full Moon, far above the mountains. She also explains that we are indebted to Snitsmān-a for cleaning the Moon's face after the Aiqwaiust have blackened it, as otherwise no light would be visible. This ends the spectacle; the uninitiated are sent away, and the ceremonial concludes in the manner already described.

This constitutes the Moon dance as practised during the ceremonial season, but in addition X is required to dance whenever his patron is hidden by an eclipse. On such occasions the ritual is identical with that described for an eclipse of the Sun.

THE DANCE OF THE MURDERED SLAVE

One of the chieftains who came to earth in the beginning of time was Alkumotusaix, whose wealth was so great that he was able to invite his associates from far and near to potlatches, and thus acquire many xuseek names for his only son. Becoming surfeited with this form of greatness, he decided to initiate a kusiut ceremonial for his child. At that time chiefs were so powerful that they could create their own repositories, and Ālimmotusaix resolved to make his son's in his own house. To give strength to it, he dug a hole and buried alive in it a female slave with her small infant. The unfortunate woman was a member of the tribe known to the Bella Coola as Ťaxsk!, probably a branch of the Haida; like all other northern tribeswomen she wore in her lower lip a plug of abalone-shell. Ālimmotusaix also buried in the hole a large number of the wasps which abounded in his house. The uninitiated were told that the woman had chanced to stumble upon a repository and had become kalals, "rendered incapable of returning"; from this circumstance she was henceforth known as Ānukulslaix. The kukusiut also informed non-members that the woman had been made immortal, and was forever to remain as a slave in the repository. Ālimmotusaix chose the name Qapātus, "Sharp-Nosed," for his son, a reference to the sharp beaks of the numerous ravens shown on every object in his house. This designation has since been transmitted in the usual manner; every owner has had the right to perform a dance with the buried woman as patron.

In describing the ritual it will be convenient to refer to Qapātus as X.

When X wishes to dance he obtains permission from the marshals and makes his preliminary plans in the customary way. A suitable date for the coming of the call is chosen, and, on the night preceding, the weeping of Ānukulslaix is heard in the forest behind the village. The weeper is one of X's associates, but no uninitiated would be reckless enough to venture near. She moves down the valley, as if coming from the repository near the village of Stuix. The next evening X receives his call and the uninitiated are expelled from his house. The dancer blackens his face, puts on a ceremonial collar, and goes out alone to find the slave woman; presently he returns, leading Ānukulslaix by the hand. She is disguised as an old, old woman, clad in rags and carrying on her back a bundle made to represent a small infant; over her face is a mask with a plug of abalone-shell in the lower lip (see Plate 12).‡ She slowly circles the fire, weeping bitterly, while the kukusiut

The singers at once begin to compose a new song, describing X's visitor and something of her history. The ritual that follows is that of the ordinary kwakiutlmow and requires no special description. On the night of nuxwitilaqa a large number of masks are ordered, including one series representing wasps, another of young lads, and still another of the latter with swollen faces. The only other part of the dance with a distinctive ritual is that of nuhawa.

[532] In the early evening the kukwiat assemble in X's house to inspect the enormous wasps' nest which the carpenters have erected behind the fire. In recent years this has been made of canvas, taking the place of matting. Within are several stages, on which the defenders stand, each a kwiat wearing a wasp's mask and carrying a miniature bow and arrow. The attackers are other members of the society chosen for their small stature and armed with clubs and branches; each wears a boy's mask and each carries a second, representing the same individual with badly swollen face. Considerable time is required to perfect the arrangements and select the performers, but at last all is in readiness and the uninitiated are called in.

They marvel at the enormous wasps' nest and presently witness an assault on it. The attackers, protected by armour, valiantly beat on the structure with clubs as they swing their branches as if brushing away the angry insects; this is the way that boys normally attack a wasps' nest. The defenders discharge their arrows and at intervals one of the attackers calls out in pain and falls down, presently rising with badly swollen face. The uninitiated do not realize that he has slipped the second mask from beneath his blanket to his face. X stands at one side, throwing his arm with a sweeping motion in the direction of the combat, while Ax̌'itwalmis gives her customary explanations. At last the nest is beaten down whereupon one of the Cannibals begins to growl and the uninitiated rush away. The ritual concludes in the usual way.

dance with Ocoqua as patron. This was first used by Lalpanu-i, a relative of Sinaqali, and has since been the prerogative of the owner of the name, which it will be convenient to term X. Being of foreign origin, there is no repository at Kinaqui; in fact, there is none even in Bulle Bulle itself, where the hactai society is believed to lack both healing power and ceremonial authority.* The Ocoqua dance is thus the only one without a repository, so far as could be learned it is not performed in Bulle Coola. In Bulle Bulle the original rite was connected both with the sonai and hactai repositories, but in Kinaqui with the latter alone.

When X wishes to dance, which may be at any time during the ceremonial season, he consults the medicine and picks a suitable date. In this dance men, the carpenters are requested to make an ocoqua, sometimes using a red skin as basis. On the day that the call comes, the dummy is placed in the water of the ford, close to shore. Suddenly the herald cries the cry that a supernatural being is coming to X; the assembled uninitiated flee from his house and the hactai assemble. Presently the dancer rushes forth, followed by a band of his fellows, and plunges into the water. From a distance non-members can see arms and legs flying to and fro, blood flows as the hactai struggling in the shallows strike each other's arms, and they have no hesitation in believing the herald who reports that a fight is taking place with a warlike ocoqua. X at last leaves his heavy adium, amid the dousing of the women.

That night the uninitiated are called to X's house where the dummy ocoqua, guarded by the dancer and several other hactai, is placed behind the fire. Hidden strings have been fastened to its arms so that it moves and seems to be alive. One of the singers takes a horse and beats time, singer, and all the hactai call out i—. This is repeated four times, accompanied, on the last repetition, by the return of the ocoqua whence it came. This is done by gathering the body from sight, but of course the uninitiated do not know this. A

*This is, of course, a Bulle Coola version.

[The Octopus Dance]

* 575 Cannibal begins to growl and soon the kokoxtsi are left alone
* 796 in the house. The singers beat out a new song for X and the usual continues like that of any other kwakiutl. No description is needed for the ceremonial that occurs on nastalkup and galem.

On the evening of nalacum the uninitiated are summoned in due course. The exact number of masked figures shown would not be known, but among them is always an octopus. [534] The rite concludes in the usual manner.

The presents given in connection with the Octopus dance are more valuable than those bestowed at most hamatsa rituals, [533] accordingly none but wealthy people are able to carry it out. [532] The benefits especially are always beneficiaries.

THE DANCE OF THE DARK-HOUSE

* 575 One of the most peculiar and irregular of hamatsa dances is
* 796 that performed by a certain K'ulpem, whom it will be convenient to call X. His patron is the supernatural woman Sisqumtsi, [534] Dark-Shade, whose home is beneath the thick overgrowth of the river valleys, thus explaining the darkness and shadows found in such places. X's repository is beneath some [770] large cedars near the northern side of the Bella Coola valley, [771] a few hundred yards above the end of the road, it is probable that other dancers with the same patron have repositories in other dark and gloomy spots.

When X wishes to dance he must as usual obtain consent from the marshals who insist that he delay his performance until after the solstice or nalacum. The reason is because his patron, Dark-Shade, alone of all supernatural beings, has the [771] power to open every repository, X brings her to the village and [770] in consequence cells come to many kokoxtsi,[illegible] which would be undesirable during the first few weeks of the season. On
* 575 the evening of the day selected for the beginning of the dance,
* 796 X steals away from the village with three or four kokoxtsi, [illegible] The implication is that such cells come from repositories, and from the land above, the repository stands.

[The Dance of the Stone Man]

purified and which can still be seen, with its head facing the west.

The preliminaries of Kwaxa's dance do not differ from those already described, although it is uncertain whence comes the actual call. A large number of masks are constructed, as well as a huge wooden figure of the Stone Man himself, and smaller ones of his wife and four children. When the uninitiated are called in on the night of rehearsal they see the Stone Man and his family standing behind the fire, while the body of the house is filled with a number of masked figures. The latter keep shouting to the Stone Man and he answers them, as he does mortals who pass his station on Dean Channel. The mortals always arrange that he does not reply to one of the masked figures, whereupon the others gibe at this unfortunate and call him that he will die within a year. It is common knowledge that if the Stone Man does not answer the hail of a passer-by, the latter will soon die. The uninitiated are impressed to find that supernatural beings share this belief.

WA-WA-MOOK

This dance is the prerogative of a Gaxsa named Wa'a, "Cotton Salmon." Its origin is attributed to the experience of an ancestor of the dancer who was helped by, and received his name from, one of these fish. Only a fragment of the ritual could be learned, enough to show that it has many points of resemblance with Gaxsa rites. When Wa'a performs, the central fire is raked apart and he appears to lie down on the ashes between the two flanking sections, evergreen boughs and sand are thrown over him, and the fire drawn together over his body. After an hour or more, when the uninitiated imagine he must be baked, his singing is heard, and Wa'a walks in through the front door. Deception is practised probably by means of a doorway fastened with dark curtains which contrast with the face so that it seems as if the body itself were writhing. It is said that the first Wa'a was actually able to perform this feat by means of the power given him by the salmon, but the kwaxiut all understand that later performances by those with the same name are only possible with the assistance of carpenters. This dance has not been carried out for so many years that the details have been forgotten.

THE DANCE OF THE BIRDS

The Bella Coola notice that in autumn many of the birds disappear, to be seen no more until spring. Ignorant of a warmer climate to the south and of the causes of migration, they explain the phenomenon by saying that Alquntam collects the birds in some mysterious place for the winter and releases them in the spring. It is believed that he does the same with supernatural birds in the land above. The setting free of the birds, which is in effect a scattering, is known as nuxqwakut and is personified; he is the patron of a kwaxiut named Qoma. For the subject of this man's dance a huge circular cage containing wooden birds is constructed. By means of a regular mass of token strings they are made to "fly," to the extreme amusement of the uninitiated. This is one of the most complicated kwaxiut rites. Contrary to the usual practice, no eagle down is used for fear that it might settle on the strings and betray the existence to the spectators.

THE DANCE OF DARKNESS AND SLEEP

The patron of this dance is a being who has the power of bringing nightfall, and later, sleep. In accordance with his double function, a dual personality is attributed to him. In fact, he is almost two beings; as Sxqlomiait, "Darkness," he causes night to come once every twenty-four hours, whereupon as Sisiutam he brings sleep. His kwaxiut protégé displays on subsequent days with black painted masks, representing both phases of his patron.

THE DANCE OF THE WHIRLWIND

Whirlwinds, though of rare occurrence in British Columbia, are known to the Bella Coola who believe that they are caused by the being Swdziarmanem. Like all supernatural creatures,

Whirlwind usually remains in the land above but sometimes visits this earth. He is patron for a kuxiut who displays a mask representing him in characteristic form, the design of which is said never to vary. 575 * 796 * 776 [821] [592]

THE DANCE OF THE EARTHQUAKE

The Bella Coola believe that an earthquake is caused by the earth slipping very slightly from the grasp of Snienia. This being is patron for certain kukuxiut and whenever a tremor occurs, his protégés call their associates and a dance is held. This may, of course, be at any season, and the ritual during spring or summer is identical with that described for dancers whose patrons are Thunder, the Sun, or the Moon. The theme of the song is of the manner in which Snienia performs his function of holding the world. A call from Snienia may also come in the normal manner to one of his protégés during the ceremonial season, but the ritual is of the usual type and merits no special description. In Kimsquit, Snienia is patron to a kuxiut named Ałłhałłełnia. [829] [588] [551]

THE DANCE OF TIDE-MEASURER

The height to which the tides shall rise is decided by a male supernatural being, Mentlate cum, "Tide-Measurer." He is patron of a kuxiut named Tołł, whose repository is near Łułła. One of Tołł's ancestors brought the rite with him from above in the beginning of time. The songs used at the dance describe how Tide-Measurer uses a stick in deciding how far the waters shall rise. During the day of nakacum the uninitiated are told to go to their houses but, by peering round the corners and through chinks, as they always do, they are able to see a masked figure walk into the ocean, and thrust down to the bottom a stick which he carries. This is repeated four times during the day. [829] [551] [776] [588]

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL BULL-HEAD

One patron of this type is the ordinary river bull-head. It is said that long ago this fish wanted to follow his friends, the salmon, to the ocean, but was persuaded to remain in the river to act as nurse to their children in his house, the river bottom. Early in the world's history he objected to people exposing his dwelling, that is, pulling up the stones from the river-bed where he was wont to lie, and showed his resentment by sending a very cold wind. Ever since that time boys are not allowed to fish for bull-heads in winter. As far as could be learnt, this dance has no special features.

[821] [224]

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL HERRING-HEAD

One of the supernatural beings living in the land above who is patron for a certain kuciut is the head of a female herring. Little is known of this being, even her appearance is subject to doubt. For the nuhaum of her protégé, a number of masks representing herring, as well as human-like beings, are prepared. When the uninitiated are present, one of the disguised figures calls to his fellows to bring their oots and capture the fish.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL DOG SALMON

Another fish dwelling in the land above is Dukdukinuc, the supernatural dog salmon. He is patron of some kuciut but the ritual of the dance, known as sindemanais, was not obtained. The similarity between Dukdukinuc and Dukdukinmen, those who await Nedkynm, appears merely to be an accidental resemblance in terminology, dependent upon a stem meaning "to come," or "coming." The significance of this in connection with the supernatural dog salmon could not be ascertained.

THE DANCE OF Almaphaikila

*575 *796 776 184 [755] In Kimsquit it is believed that Ant'lituulcais has a husband, Almaphaikila, who is patron for several kuciut dances. His function is to restore to life any uninitiated who chance to stumble upon a repository and are stricken down by his wife. Like a shaman, he does this by blowing violently upon the back of the victim's neck and calling out, hsip. From constant repetition his mouth has become large and round. When displayed on nuhuum, the mask representing Atmophitèle is painted black and has bulging, blown-out cheeks, and a round protruding mouth as if in the act of blowing. Neither the dance nor belief in this figure appear to occur in Bella Coola itself.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL BARK-BEATER

In the land above there lives a supernatural woman who spends all her time in pounding cedar-bark such as is used, either dyed or undyed, for ceremonial objects of different kinds. Her name is Sjèèjèèum di Sneèèlele and she is patron for various hahaiat. On the nuhuum of her Kimoquit prodigie she appears as a masked figure engaged in her usual occupation and makes a circuit of the house while a salmon is displayed. The relationship between this being and the salmon is problematical, and it is uncertain whether or not the same rite is practised in Bella Coola.

[532]

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL AWAKENER

Every morning in Nanqulemoite the woman Spaiqhaymumle-a goes around waking up the supernatural beings. She is patron for several hamat dances. On the nuhuum of her prodigi, a masked figure representing the Awakener goes to every house in the village and pounds on the doors, but does not enter, to the relief of the uninitiated who have sought refuge within the bed-rooms.

575* 796* 776 [532]

THE DANCE OF DAWN

Not only must the supernatural beings be around in the morning, but every day the Sun himself must be requested to appear; this is done by the beings known as Xemsemtum, who are patrons for several hahaiat. On nuhuum they appear and Ana'Ekwulnaie explains to the uninitiated who they are and what they do. With them comes the being Oninitoma, "The Sleeper," wearing a mask to represent a drowsy man who constantly yawns and rubs his eyes. It is explained that this being delights in sleep and does not care if the sun never rises.

THE DANCE OF THE GREEDY ONE

Nuxnikinoikum, also called Turnai-ec, is a greedy creature who spends his time going from one supernatural being to another in the land above, always begging for food. He is patron for several tukuciut and on the nuhuum of one of his prestigis a masked figure representing the Greedy One visits every house in the village asking for food. The uninitiated retreat to the bed-rooms, but the tukuciut comply with his request. In consequence the dancer's house is filled with food which is given away to the tukuciut guests.

THE DANCE OF THE REPOSITORY MAKER

Some repositories were constructed in the beginning of time by the supernatural being, Nuxadjinum, who is patron for several tukuciut. On the nuhuum of one of his prestigis a figure, masked to represent a male being, appears and Ax'Ulwulwic explains that this is the maker of repositories. It is uncertain whether this being is found in Bella Coola or only in Kitamaat.

THE DANCE OF Alpanim'S SLAVE

In the land above there lives a slave of Alpanim who spends his time providing fuel for the fires in Nuxpalwuxix. He is patron for a Bella Coola tuciut, though the details of his dance were not obtained.

THE DANCE OF Alpanim'S HERALD

where they settled. Ḵ'ispaxtaw had given him the ability to kill mammals and birds by merely projecting his power at them and in this way he obtained food for the whole party. He could also drive his victims with the aid of a peculiar stick beating orchestra, consisting of spruce cones. These he arranged around a fire balanced on levers which he could move with his feet; as he pressed, the cones became agitated and beat time lovingly. It was Ḵ'ispaxtaw who had given him the non-human stick-beaters. Nuxlaxmālnis tried to turn mammals into men, but succeeded only with the eyes of the wolf, wherefore those ugans appear human even today.

Ḵ'ispaxtaw gave Nuxlaxmālnis the prerogative of carrying out a kwiwi dance, which has been performed in the same manner ever since by the owners of that name. His patrons, for he has inherited the supernatural Carpenters. Nuxlaxmālnis has the further prerogative of wearing, when dancing, a wooden head-piece over his forehead representing Qe ko, probably one of the blackbirds. On the night of sahaw, when the uninitiated are called in, masked figures of the four Carpenters appear, each carrying a conventional specimen of his work. Bob (at end) illustrates the masks proper to these beings. Ḵ'ulāmalaxis, as usual, in attendance and explains the significance of the apparition.

DANCE WITH OF THE DANCE OF Nuxtuxpnam[16]

There was once a middle-aged woman who had not been initiated into the ranks of the kukwaxtas. She decided that she could gain this distinction only by seeing Ḵ'ulāmalaxis herself, so with this aim in view she set out to search for the supernatural one. First she penetrated to the source of every creek entering South Bentinck Arm; then proceeded up the Nuskumcummy River to its very head, again visiting the head-waters of every affluent, and finally went up the Bella Coola River, as before, exploring each side stream. For a whole year she travelled without seeing anything supernatural.

At the source of the Clearwater she came to a lake called Nuxcalcalcoulis, of which she could see a single column of smoke. It ascended without twist, coil, or movement, as if it were solid, so she knew that it must have a supernatural origin. Heavily she skirted the shore, till she saw that the smoke was rising from a house made of evergreen boughs. Stealing nearer, she beheld Ḵ'ulāmalaxis herself within, working with a woman Pamlaxpnam. Ḵ'ulāmalaxis was using rock crystals to strike the woman senseless, and then reviving her; but all the time was causing Pamlaxpnam to sink into the ground. Trembling with excitement the 424 mortal watched until the unfortunate Nuuxtcqyuam had almost vanished

* 575 from sight. Then a sound betrayed her to Ăuʼlikwelsaix.
* 796 "If you are a mortal," she said, "come in."
539 The woman did so, and Ăuʼlikwelsaix continued:

"I am Ăuʼlikwelsaix. You have found me, hence I give you a kusiut dance prerogative. You will have Nuuxtcqyuam as patron."

The woman returned to her home, where she performed a kusiut rite in which she portrayed the sinking of Nuuxtcqyuam into the earth.

ORIGIN MYTH OF A PECULIAR REPOSITORY

In the beginning of time there came down to Xwaxets, a point a little distance below Mount Nuxpalst, a woman whose name was Spuxpuxhailsix. Ălqantăm had given her a kusiut prerogative with a peculiar [778] repository in four parts, as if two were in either hand. Their names were Spalpăjuttăw-a, Sas-kutumăw-a, Sisiaw-i, and Samxiattăw-i. When she
● [532] danced she wore a wooden head-dress representing Woodpecker, and the masks used (her patrons?) were the sun when it is red, and an eagle. This dance has since been carried out from generation to generation by the owners of the name Spuxpuxhailsix.

Kusiut Prerogatives Other Than Dances

424 The most valuable possession of a kusiut is the dance which
* 575 he has the right to perform, but each member of the society has,
* 796 in addition, a somewhat peculiar object, sometimes material and sometimes intangible, known as a ikusiut or yeaxwax. The meaning of these two terms will become evident in the description of their uses, meanwhile they can be termed "prerogatives." When every claim to possession of the dance comes [787] automatically to him, though it can also be attracted to him by other means and without a call. There is no connection between the patron and the prerogative; for example, one kusiut who has one of the sons of Ălqantăm as the former has, as the latter, the Hummingbird. Another may have Fog, Sleep, a Snake, or one of many other objects, animate or inanimate. The "patron-puppets" described in kusiutum rites belong to this class.

In almost every case the origin is lost in antiquity, and the owner knows only that it belongs with his dance.

Few prerogatives are used when the uninitiated are present; they are essentially secret, but provide considerable amusement and are a welcome interlude in the serious rites. When the prerogative is made visible, carpenters must be employed to make it, and be paid for their work; hence this part of the ceremonial is often omitted. When no handicraft is required, it is more frequently called into play, but even in such cases its employment is not universal. Not being an essential part of the kwaiat rites, the use or omission of a prerogative is a matter which concerns the dancer alone, and he acts strictly in accordance with his own wishes, whether or not he desires the ceremony to be accompanied by every possible show. It is impossible to estimate with accuracy the relative frequency of employment, but it is probable that prerogatives of the type under consideration are used in about one-third of the kwaiat ceremonials.

If a dancer decides to display a material prerogative, he consults with a carpenter before the coming of his call and asks him to make, for example, a wooden Hummingbird. On the night of lnetámem, when all the kwaiat are present, the bird is seen to move across the back-wall of the house, pulled by concealed strings. The dancer rushes to it and appears to catch it, in reality hiding it beneath his clothing. The women drum and the heralds announce to the uninitiated in the neighbouring houses what has taken place. Carefully holding his hands cupped, as if clutching something of great value, the dancer moves to the centre of the house and returns the bird to the land above by throwing his hands upwards while the kwaiat call out hoip. This is the usual procedure when the prerogative is a bird, a small mammal, or a reptile. The same ceremonial is often repeated on the night of nuxiatáiap, particularly if the ritual proper to the occasion does not suffice to occupy the requisite time. If the prerogative is immaterial, the ritual differs. For example, when it is Fog, the dancer stretches his hands upwards, as if receiving something from above, and then makes the motion of throwing this "some-they refer. Even when full allowance is made for this, the fact still remains that the kukusiut were able to carry out dances in which they deceived the uninitiated. Above all, it is clear that those who were not members of the society had the greatest respect for the powers of those who were, and although doubt may have existed concerning the identity of the supernatural visitors, there was not the slightest concerning the ability of the kukusiut to have, for example, their stomachs ripped open. The writer discussed this point with too many old men and women to have the slightest uncertainty on this point, and he feels confident that anyone who could have listened to the account of a reliable old man concerning his fears when he had "killed" a kusiut in this manner, would have shared his conviction. 575* 796* 781 114

It would be fascinating to discuss at some length the probable history of the kusiut society, but this would entail a comparison with the rites of other coastal tribes and belongs to the realm of comparative ethnology. This monograph deals only with Bella Coola practices as the writer saw them or heard them described, so that the history of the society can only be treated from this angle. It appears certain that the rites have increased in secrecy. One old marshal with whom the matter was discussed remembered having heard that long ago masks were constructed in the presence of the uninitiated. Considered as an isolated statement this would have little value, but in conjunction with information derived from Kimsquit it becomes of importance. It is true that in Kimsquit the masks are made in secret, but they are shown to the uninitiated as masks, and the writer was told of one instance in which Tlaqoa, during his round of the village, fell into the water and remained there all day, to the amusement of non-members who recognized that he was merely a disguised human being. It is even said that long ago the manufacture of masks was entrusted to influential uninitiated. It is clear that there has been a tremendous increase in secrecy even at Kimsquit, and a great deal more at Bella Coola. The writer believes that 595* 796* 178 184 592

*575 long ago the kwaxit society was composed of individuals re-
*796 garded as having supernatural endowments, and who perhaps 178 believed this themselves. In course of time their influence 184 increased to such an extent that they were able to convince

[115] Unfortunately, information from Kimsquit was obtained almost exclusively from one old man, who, though a marshal well informed in kwaxit matters and in many ways an almost ideal informant, had long since realized that the dances could be nothing more than representations, and it is possible that his remarks were coloured by this knowledge. Though he tended to minimize the attitude of belief with which the un-
[981] initiated regarded masked figures, yet he fully agreed with every statement made by the Bella Coola themselves with regard to the firm belief of non-members concerning the supernatural powers of the dancers. He also confirmed statements
[688] respecting punishment if an error should occur, and mentioned the shooting of a Bella Bella dancer who had allowed his mask to fall during a nanak dance. As far as actual ritual is concerned, the differences in procedure between Bella Coola and Kimsquit are unimportant, and differences in belief are less than they appear at first sight. The Bella Coola kwaxit [981] seem to have perfected their organization and to have been able to impress the uninitiated to a greater extent than their Kimsquit fellows, but the fundamentals of the society are identical.

*575 Traditions concerning the early history of the society are *796 probably of little value historically, but they are important as 193 indicating the mental attitude of the Bella Coola. Considering the importance of the society there are relatively few accounts of what took place long ago; the Bella Coola know that it exists, believe that the rites are identical with those carried out by their ancestors for generations, and theorize no further. It was only in the beginning of time that things were radically different; it is believed that then all the people were endowed

Tsuhse remained encamped for several days, during which time he sent word to the Bella Coola that he regretted the death of Xelewelist and had come to make peace. He added that his followers had tried to dissuade him, saying that he would be killed, but he had answered that he was too great a man to allow fear to influence his actions. B T 648 728

Having waited for several days, the party came up the Bella Coola River, their canoe loaded with presents and eagle down, while Tsuhse's brother, Nesiles, wore the mask of his tsewinam as further proof of friendly intentions. It was unusual to display one except in a tsewak ceremonial, but this was an unprecedented event; he knew that he might soon be killed and he preferred to die while bearing the obvious mark of incorporation with some incident of an ancestral myth. The canoe was beached opposite the house of Pielas where the crew blew eagle down into the air to mark their peaceful mission. Men had gathered from all parts of the Bella Coola valley and several hot-heads wished to disregard the safe-conducts and slay their enemies, a course which they had recommended for several days and had tried to precipitate by overt acts against the Kitkatla. Pielas himself had not spoken, but he now appeared and advised the people not to harm Tsuhse, since everlasting hostility would result. Though his wishes did not entirely quiet the angry ones, they virtually assured the Kitkatla of a welcome. Pielas brought forward a mouse-skin, and told some of his people to hold it spread so that, when Tsuhse leapt from his canoe, he would land upon it, and could be carried to the house without putting foot to the ground. Tsuhse answered proudly that there was nothing on earth strong enough to support him, since his many potlatches had made him incomparably heavy. None the less, he accepted the honour, an assistance to landing shown only to mighty chiefs, and was carried into the house where he was seated in the far right-hand corner, an honourable location. Pielas invited all the people in the vicinity, slaves as well as Bella Coola, and the inner partitions of the house had to be removed to provide space for the throng. No one knew of this except his nephew, Nemankai, who was to carry it out. When all were seated, the latter appeared, his face smeared with ochre, and his hair tied up in a top-knot with weasel skins as is customary during war. Nemankai moved sunwise around the house, brandishing a musket and repeatedly pointing it at Tsuhse in a threatening manner. If the Kitkatla had shown nervousness, particularly if one of them had fired his own musket, a massacre would have resulted. 115 Schooner lacked the mental acumen of Joshua and Jim, but 177 he revealed himself as a tribal patriarch, proud of his family's [153] history and eager to assist his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, but feeling himself lost and helpless in the struggle before them. With sadness, but without bitterness, he used to speak of the approaching end of Bella Coola culture, and his words brought home the tragedy which the spread of civilization brings to so many, and the responsibility resting upon the white people as a whole.

153 Until an intelligence test is devised to correlate the mental 115 ability of the white man with that of the native, it is impossible to compare the two scientifically. None the less, the writer deliberately expresses the opinion that Joshua Moody and Jim Pollard are two of the most brilliant men he has met in any walk of life. They are undoubtedly the most able of the Bella Coola; others have only slightly less ability, while the mass of the population compares favourably with an 178 average white community. Their ability, however, is definitely conditioned by their conservatism. Absolute trust in the traditions of their ancestors has checked speculation, as the established explanation is never questioned; new inventions, unauthorized by custom, have been regarded as almost sacri-
[620] legious; the force of public opinion, while valuable as a deterrent to anti-social practices, has effectively restrained innovations. The Bella Coola are a good example of a community where development has been atrophied by extreme conservatism fostered by religious beliefs.

105 Taking into account the material obstacles, the achievements of these people have not been insignificant. In former [322] times, provided only with tools of stone and untempered copper, they built graceful canoes, made watertight boxes, hewed planks from mighty cedars, and erected large houses which called for considerable engineering skill. Judged by [532] white standards, their carving and painting lacked artistic deli-
[535] cacy, but it required no mean ability to portray crest designs to meet their own standards. Passing from the purely mechanical

501 of the older people remember seeing in their youth another type, ikkan, with a high raised prow; this may have been identical with the nulka which others describe as having an elevated bow and a low stern. An entirely different craft was the tsuskwi'i, named from one of the geese, [525] probably the white-fronted goose. A strip of maple fastened along each side caught the water in moving, with a sound like that of the peculiar rustling flight of the bird. The bow was often carved in the form of a [532] bird's head and the stern in that of a tail to further the resemblance. No living Bella Coola claims to have seen one of these canoes, though some had heard of them from their grandparents. The large, open type of canoe made by the Haida was known to the Bella Coola, but not constructed by them. Sails were used on all ocean-going canoes; they were usually of matting, though skins sewn together were occasionally employed.

501 Canoes are occasionally lashed together. In several kwiste dances a 535 wide platform for dancing is required, and the need is met by lashing planks crosswise over two canoes, near the bow and stern, thus fastening them together. Planking is laid on the two supports and a platform so constructed. Careful inquiries showed that this fastening was merely a temporary arrangement; the beams were not bound in any particular manner, nor was there any fixed distance between the craft. Sometimes 501 the same expedient was used for transport when the load was too heavy [171] for two canoes separately, a device which is said to have been used more commonly by the tribes of the outer coast than the Bella Coola. Canoes lashed together are termed de-awaxip.

Rafts, sutdwa'a, consisting of rough logs fastened together with cross-pieces, were commonly used on the lakes of the interior, and occasionally for river work when canoes were unavailable and there was no time to make them. Another expedient in similar emergencies was to [177] make bark canoes, such as are still constructed by the Carriers. The Bella Coola regard the construction of these as definite copying, and do not profess to have as much skill as their teachers whose canoes, it is said, can be folded for portaging. There is a tradition that, many generations ago, a few clever Bella Coola knew how to make skin canoes.

THE PREPARATION OF CEDAR-BARK

314 Early spring is the time to cuxdamk, that is, to gather the inner bark [221] of the cedar. Men occasionally assist in the task, though this is really [462] woman's work. The worker selects a small cedar, choosing one about [412] six inches in diameter, with smooth trunk and relatively free from knots. With a knife she makes a horizontal incision in the bark, two or three feet from the ground, sometimes girdling the sapling. Then she inserts her

287 thrown in, and hot stones lifted in to heat the mixture. Even at the 386 present time dye is never made on a stove, as it is thought that the gradual heating by means of stones is essential. As it becomes warm, the woman thoroughly stirs the ingredients with her hands, then, when it boils, some of the bark is lifted out and more added. This process is continued until the brew is deep red in colour. It is allowed to stand for a few minutes before the pounded cedar-bark is placed in it. The operator gently works it around until it is saturated, then lifts it out and hangs it up to dry. Several pieces of bark can be dyed in one solution, though it is necessary to add more alder-bark and more stones to maintain the proper strength and heat.

[285 Although red cedar-bark is the kind most commonly used, the Bella 177] Coola sometimes use the yellow cedar for mats and blankets, an art learnt from the Bella Bella.

THE MANUFACTURE OF PAINT

386 Paint, such as was used both for decorating the body and for pro-[309 viding designs on wood, was obtained from a kind of rock found near 532 the head of a creek entering the Bella Coola from the south near Ewed.
317] Fragments of the red stone were broken off, thrown into a vessel containing water, and brought to a boil by the insertion of hot stones. Under the action of heat the rock became soft so that the manufacturer was able to pulverize it and run off the semi-liquid mixture into a small box. He would then chew cedar-bark and salmon roe, and spit into the paint, thoroughly mixing his saliva with it. When dry, the mixture was ready for use, and could be kept indefinitely.

[532 Anyone could paint who had the artistic skill, and it was chiefly artists 177] who used to make this kind of paint. Since the introduction of the white man's brilliant colours, there has been no demand for the duller native shade, and the making of paint has been discontinued.

of these data refer to insects, and may be of interest to entomologists, although my spelling of Indian words is very problematical, because some of the sounds I can neither hear nor make, and I am unable to record adequately many of those that I can hear. The data here given are preliminary to a complete working over of my notes, but are believed to be nearly complete. B C 114 [104]

Insects apparently were not so well observed by the Bellacoola as were useful mammals and plants, the stinger of the bumble-bee, for instance, being supposed to be in its mouth. Few insects had names, that is, mainly those which were used or which troubled the Indians. Insects were not used for food, and honey was unknown until after the coming of the white man. The head of the gad-fly was used as a pattern in painting designs, the nest of the yellow-jacket in sympathetic magic or witchcraft, and "fly spit" was said to be good for sores. They had a story about the bumble-bee. B 825 B [262] [532] [757] [789]

Among the Ulkatcho also observation of insects was weaker than that of mammals and plants, and they apparently had names for only a few insects, those which troubled them. Ant lyon pits and its method of taking prey were known. Insects were of no use to the Ulkatcho whatever. An instance was observed of an Indian amusing himself with a buzzing fly held in his mouth. They employed smudges, fish oil, gum of the cottonwood, and blossoms of cow parsnip with oil to protect themselves from mosquitoes, black flies and no-see-ums, and smoke to protect foods from flies. C 825 C [751]

The Ant lyon, among the Ulkatcho, is called Kinnelkats. It is said to be numerous at Ulkatcho, but that it was useless and that there was no story about it. My informant voluntarily showed me the pits made by the larvae of this insect and, catching ants for the purpose, demonstrated its well-known method of taking its prey.

The grasshopper (Orthoptera), that makes a noise by rubbing its wings together when it flies, was called Telcus, among the Ulkatcho.

"Fly spit," that is the material surrounding a nymph of a spittle insect, also known as a frog hopper (Cercopidae), is said B 825 757

A fly which does not bite, perhaps the house fly among the Bellacoola, was called Mamamik, and was said to lay its eggs on fish and fish eggs. The place called Nemamamik was so named because the people thought they saw flies and they said mamamik, but when the supposed flies fell they were seen to be toads.

Among the Ulkatcho, this fly was called Anthen, and was said to lay its eggs on salmon. To keep off flies of all kinds and mosquitoes the blossoms of the cow parsnip, Heracleum lanatum Michx, called Gooms in Ulkatcho, were put in oil of the eulachon fish or any kind of oil and the mixture was put on the body. Every food that was smoked was smoked so that flies would keep away from it. Flies were not used as fish bait.

The Gad-fly, Tabanus sp.? probably amoenum O. S. of the family Tabanidae, which is commonly called horsefly, is numerous when the horses come down to Bella Coola from the interior. Among the Bellacoola it is called Sith lay ooll. It is said to lay its eggs in the backs of the caribou in July, and these hatch into "worms." The face and eyes, being pretty, were used long ago as a pattern for a picture which was painted on bone beads. There was no story of this fly.

Among the Ulkatcho, this gad-fly is called Cho co, and a smaller one is called Cho cho yas, yas signifying small. Once I was told that no medicine was used to keep off the gad-fly, but on another occasion that cottonwood gum with oil was used. Apparently for his own amusement, my Ulkatcho Indian informant held one of these flies by the abdomen inside his mouth and made it buzz.

Two kinds of little black biting fly, house fly (Dysphoromyia sp.?) apparently considered as one, are called Ukkyin ooll in Bellacoola. They are called Cho cho yas in Ulkatcho yas signifying small.

The Black fly, Simulidae, among the Bellacoola is called Tlous cous and Alk co ok hoil.

Among the Ulkatcho it is called Wheeko, while Tulk is the name of black flies, mosquitoes, and no-see-ums. All these were kept off with a smoke smudge made with a fire of any kind of wood on which were put such things as grass, wet, or rotten wood, and by the strong house blowing in the higher regions. He is quite naked, and blows everyone whom he can lay hold of. If he cannot reach anyone he will take his own arm. It is believed that he has lost his soul, which fell from the body when the spirit came to him. Therefore the dancers must try for four days to recapture his soul. The night after they have recovered it the dancer dressed to a bear-skin and wearing a large headring, hearty breakfast and supper, all made of red and white cedar-bark. Bears dance the do not bite people, but merely throw red cedar, or bear dogs to pieces and devour them. Those who bite people will also eat corpses. The dancer has to observe a number of regulations. For four years after his initiation he must not gamble. He must stay away from his wife for one year, but this period is being reduced to six months. For two or three months he must not leave his house.

The O'ing (= the laughter) and the Ot'ala (= the thunder) do not go into the woods to be initiated, but both must fast three days before their first dance. The O'ing "makes fun of everything" and amuses people with his antics. The Ot'ala carries stones and sticks, and breaks household goods and canoes. If he has destroyed some object during the day he goes for 3 or eight days in the forests. The O'ing and the Ot'ala must stay for one month, when they have danced, to their homes.

If a person transgresses the laws of the Kwakiutl, for instance when the dancer has gambled, or when a man performs a dance to which he has no right, also when a person forbids the ceremonies or makes a mistake in dancing, his punishment is death. The chiefs assemble to consult and the offender is called before the court. After his offence has been proved he is asked whether he is willing to suffer the penalty of death. If he is not willing, and one of his relatives is found willing to take the penalty on himself, the guilty party is spared, and the relatives is killed in his stead. The execution of the judgment is entrusted to the dancers, who terrorize the condemned person by throwing dances into him, or by pulverizing him in some other (supernatural?) way. The object thrown by the dancers is a shell knife, or finger-nail, around the middle of which objects a brass hair is tied. If this object pierces the offender he will fall sick. Shell collects in his stomach, and if it so happens that he vomits this shell, and with it the dancer-producing object, he will recover, and is not molested any further. The leader (see the circular and other ceremonies) used to the Kwakiutl are burnt immediately at the close of each dancing season. Dancers wear a necklace of red cedar-bark, even their blankets for a whole year. The masks used in the dances represent mythical personages, and the dances are pantomimic representations of myths. Among others the dancers dance and his servant Ishgaik'anem, who wears a mask with red and blue stripes over the whole face from the right-hand upper side to the left-hand lower side, and a staff with red and blue spiral lines, appear in the dances. Prominent masks are also Qa'ksala and the Grizzlies and the sisters (see p. 618), Shamanaik'aq and his fellows, the crows and the Frog's-eye, and many others.

[illegible] the House of Shiba has who has given up his place to lover of Tsuru and Kyō-nosuke. These two might be called the nature of materials. In most traditions they are described as being in dreamy state, notwithstanding the fact that they are considered the creators of mankind. This peculiar characteristic of these deities is clearly brought out in the traditions recorded on pp. [illegible]. In one legend which I collected in Ōgiri, Kyō-nosuke's mother, Yuzumichi-no-ōgami-no, is described as a Goddess, who wants her long mate in the sea of rain, and rocks and the hills. Eventually she was overtowed into the mountain. I did not find her mentioned as one of the deities residing in the House of Shiba. According to the same tradition, the silkworm were obtained by a man who gambled with Kyō-nosuke, the silkworm being the stakes. Kyō-nosuke lost and the man took the silkworm down from heaven. Another legend of the origin of the silkworm is recorded on p. [illegible]. Silkworm is said here the Gods obtained the silkworm. According to still another tradition (p. [illegible]), the Gods obtained the silkworm by marrying a silkworm girl. In the tradition quoted above, Kyō-nosuke also gives to man the power to cure disease by means of the water of life, which the disease spirit[illegible] on the sick person.

A number of minor deities live in the House of Shiba. They might be called the servants of the principal deities. In order to understand their functions, it is necessary to note that the deities residing in the House of Shiba have particular charge of the religious ritual connected of the daily [illegible] which is called Ishiba and which corresponds to the religious of the Hondō. I have described the ceremonies and its importance in the social life of the Hondō in another paper. The Ishiba is of equal importance in our understanding of the social life and mythology of the Daily [illegible]. It is unknown to me, in this place, that the ceremonies performed during the Ishiba are mostly dramatic representations of myths relating to the various deities particularly to those of the House of Shiba. Therefore many representing these deities are used in the ceremonies. (Plate [illegible]) or [illegible] (Plate [illegible]) a series of these masks. Figs. [illegible] and [illegible] (Plate [illegible]) are masks, Kyō-nosuke, and Daikokuten. The wearing of masks of the deities makes them come to life which is the Ishiba. These deities and their functions are as follows:—Shōgatsu-Ishiba (Plate [illegible], Fig. [illegible]) relates the birth of man and animals. According to the tradition, this [illegible] man and the deities of the same in the House of Shiba. It is the particular duty to tell these deities (images), the face of the Ishiba. representing the kingfisher has the wings attached to the sides of the head, while the tail rises over the forehead. K'omoxsiT'a is said to carry a small totem in his arms. His name is Naqu'ata. When the brothers and their sister decided to do harm to men, the crowds fled to Ikeia. In some traditions these deities are described as the children of Ba'ami'n.'

776 In one tradition a'Ma'ki'ma is described as visiting houses and 773 making provisions. She is then pursued by the person whom she has wronged, and returns to the House of Myths. The deities are unable to save her; but the person who wounded her is called in, and withdraws his arrow, whereupon she recovers.' Formerly I had the impression that these [114] two deities were particularly concerned with the sick'a'ma'ma'; but this [776] impression has not been substantiated by the information I received during the past year. The two deities appear much rather as deities of the bi'ami.

775 In the case of the House of Myths there is a name named ciliam, to 773 which the use of the deities from. He came to Bi'ami'n or Sagamanu'k.
776 When Sisa and Ba'ami'n decide to destroy their victims, they send them [773] past the door of Bi'ami'n's room. The latter then rushes out of his room and devours the victims. He also intimes the Cannibal. According to the tradition of the tribe Bi'ami'n, they acquired membership in the Cannibal Society in the following manner: Bi'ami'n came down to the mountain lake, where he met with the son of Sanaki'ula, the first of the tribe. He conducted him up to the House of Myths. He took him into his room, and gave him the name Qwaka'ustam. He put a snake into his body, which enabled him to pass through the water. When the youth applied his mouth to the body of a person, the snake was pieces of flesh from the body, and devoured it. Then Bi'ami'n took the youth to the upper heaven, past the sun in the sky, and to the house of the supreme deity, Qamu'ta. The two approached the house, being blown towards it by the strong gale prevailing in the open country of the upper heaven. There found Qamu'ta sitting in front of his house; and she said to Bi'ami'n, "Why don't you come in? You wish that your friend should obtain great supernatural power. Bring him to my house, and I will give him what you desire. Stay for a short while where you are, and I will show you what I am doing." Much slowly when the door of my house closes he opens."
After a little while the door closed to view. It gave back at once, and the two children friend, but were they recovered. When the door opened to view again, it gave light. The children remained sitting on the ground, and

They had lit a fire, and their guns were broken. He said there were [illegible] 539 time, and when it was nearly dark he returned home. Before he reached 776 his house, he cut his own belly and took out some of the fat from his intestines. He cut it in five pieces, and replaced his intestines. He put the fat into his quiver. When he reached his house, he hung the quiver up outside, and entered. He imitated everything the Eyes had done. When it grew dark, he told his wife to fetch his quiver. She brought it, and he told her to open it and to feed his children. She took the fat out, placed it on a stick, and put it near the fire; and as soon as it grew warm, the Raven cried, "Pia! Don't put it so near the fire. I feel sick when you do so." He jumped up took hold of the fat, and put it back in his belly.
The Eyes said, "Formerly I fed your children, but you were the first not to treat me properly. You did not give any food to my children." Then the Eyes took some fat, and flung one piece to each of the Raven's children. He cut some more and gave it to them also. Then the Raven said,
"I will give you one of my children, that it may grow up to company with yours."

It is said that the Orange spirit Tu'ku'ti was killed at one time by an 777 Indian who took his place. This tale is recorded in Chap. IX. It belongs to 776 the cycle of the village Tsawalk. A similar tradition is told of Xaxe, to which name the Carrier call the Raven, their principal culture hero. 778
Many traditions referring to Xaxe are common to the Carrier, the Bella Coola, and the Kwakiutl of Rivers Inlet.

The Bella Coola believe that a being called Q'ness is the father of all 776 conceptions. When a hunter starts from his house to kill a bear, 776 he should close his eyes and open them again. If the animal is Q'ness, it will appear to be red shape or a bank of cumulus cloud. The hunter 805 should then accost the apparition. If he should descend, he would kill and die.

The thunderstorm is produced by the Thunderbird, who lives on the 776 mountains, in the company of a number of spirits, who are considered his particular friends. The Thunderbird himself is represented by a black 778 mask with red mouth. The nose is straight carved, the forehead bulging forward, and the chin protrudes almost as far forward as the nose (Plate XII, 5 Fig. 1). His headdress is called Kwakiutlsamm (Plate XII, Fig. 2). He dies is painted with orange and blue stripes, and he carries a speaker's staff which is painted with spots of the same colors. He watches the door of the Thunderbird's house. In the house live the Gulbin (Plate XII, Fig. 3); the Owl, who is considered the chief of the Thunderbird (Plate XII, Fig. 4);
the Hummingbird, Q'ngin (Plate XII, Fig. 5); the Gulubup (Plate XII, Fig. 6) 778 every morning when the sun rises. Its labor ceases that he rises prop- 556 erly. The first six of these fellows are grouped in pairs, and are 557 believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, 558 and rainbow. In the lowest three fellows make their appearance, and are represented by snakes. Kwakiutl and Kwagwilhla wear the 559 design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Kwakiutl by a 560 double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over 561 forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Kwagwilhla has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Alaxalilla and Alaxalilla wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Qlaqlaxalilla and Qlaxalilla have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qalaxwa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The eighth is Galilla (who wants to have bluebirds feet), whose the design of the rainbow is black and blue. The ninth, Alaxa'k, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called Alaxalilla (the sister), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a blubber filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and purchased by the people whom she has robbed.

The sisa'k, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of 575 the clans, is permitted even by a being that lives in the sea. A man who 577 had gone out hunting met the sisa'k and was instructed by him in the 576 secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean 578 their houses and to show them with clean wood before he commenced to paint. Then he danced the sisa'k and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with tails of sea-lion skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sea. Ever since that time the Ba'kwis dance the sisa'k. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each clan its 614 crests. Each clan has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the 624 sisa'k only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are 532 the sacred possessions of each clan. All clans, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a clan are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although 624 the property of the various clans, must nevertheless be acquired by 532 each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to 536 acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the clan 614 to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisa'k. A person can not take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nuk'ala'ata, the Indian, to whom I one my information regarding the clans, and who is a member of the gens Intelmott of the Tsilt'ne', stated that he had received the raven when known his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received the eagle. He hoped that his mother would give him the whole at his second potlatch, and would at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, as develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his own children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a ko'sint name, which remains through life, and a Ku'stenox name, which is changed at these festivals. Thus, Tsoi'ste'sta's (which is his ko'sint name) Ku'stenox name was Al'ilxmax'ba'alx, but at his next potlatch he intended to take the name of Kalit'kin. These names are also the property of the various clans, each clan having its own names. When a man possesses several sisan'k' secrets, he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their sisan'k' secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of her clan. When a person grows old, he gives away all his sisan'k' secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more. The coat and the sisan'k' carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular clan.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die, the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die, his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so, he had to name the price which he was going to pay the owner in its stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The ko'sint is presided over by a female spirit, called Anaflikuta'al'x. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Anaflikuta'al'x invited her into her cave and taught her the secrets of the ko'sint. She wore ornaments of red cedar bark around her head, waist, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair strewn with eagle down. She commanded the 575 to him and takes him up to the sun, where he is initiated. Early one [782] morning he recovers, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all 787 his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn out by the strong winds blowing in the higher regions. He is quite naked, and bites everyone [165] whom he can lay hold of. If he can not catch anyone he will bite his own arm. It is believed that he has lost his soul, which fled from the [774] body when the spirit came to him. Therefore the shamans must try [790] for four days to recapture his soul. The night after they have succeeded it the Sisaoʼla dances, clothed in a breechcloth and wearing a large [347] hand ring, heavy bracelets and anklets, all made of red cedar bark.

[301] Sometimes he appears wearing the mask of the Gwʼnpela (fig. 280), the spirit which initiated him. This mask corresponds exactly to that of DzelkwalanaxʼLaʼwat of the Kwakiutl.

Those Sisaoʼla do not bite people, but merely devour raw salmon or tear dogs to pieces and devour them. Those who bite people will also devour corpses. The Sisaoʼla has to observe a number of regulations. For four years after his initiation he must not gamble. He must stay away from his wife for one year, but this period is being reduced to one month. For two or three months he must not leave his house.

The oʼlex (the laughter) and the daʼtla (the thrower) do not go into the woods to be initiated, but both must fast three days before their first dance. The oʼlex "makes fun of everything" and scratches people with his nails. The daʼtla carries stones and sticks and breaks household goods and canoes. If he has destroyed some object during the day, he pays for it at night when he dances. The oʼlex and the daʼtla, after they have danced, must stay in their houses for one month.

575 If a person transgresses the laws of the koʼsint, for instance, when 638 the xlaxoʼla gambles, or when a man performs a dance to which he has no right, also when a person derides the ceremonies or makes a mistake in dancing, his punishment is death. The chiefs assemble in [792] council and the offender is called before the court. After his offense has been proved, he is asked whether he is willing to suffer the penalty 575 of death. If he is not willing and one of his relatives is found willing 688 to take the penalty on himself, the guilty party is spared and the substitute killed in his stead. The execution of the judgment is intrusted 754 to the shaman, who bewitches the condemned person by throwing dis-756 ease into him or by poisoning him in some other (supernatural?) way. The object thrown by the shaman is a shell, bone, or finger nail, around the middle of which objects a human hair is tied. If this object strikes the attacker, he will fall sick. Blood is believed to collect in his stomach, and if it happens that he vomits this blood, and with it the disease-producing object, he will recover, and is not molested any further. The masks (not the whistles and other ornaments) used in the ceremonial are burnt immediately at the close of each dancing season. Natives must wear a necklace of red cedar bark over their blankets for a whole year. The masks used in the dances represent mythical personages, and the dances are pantomimic representations of myths. Among others, the thunder bird and his servant, Ts'ooskwa'ntsoos (who wears a mask with red and blue stripes over the whole face from the right-hand upper side to the left-hand lower side, and carries a staff with red and blue spiral lines), appear in the dances. Prominent masks are also Ts'ooskwa and his brothers and his sisters; Hamamts'a'ts and his fellows, the raven and the sea-eagle, and many others.[1]

[illegible]

THE TSIMSHIAN, NISQA', HAIDA, AND TLINGIT.

The tribes of this group learned the ceremonial severally from the Hi'Ltsuq. Although I have not witnessed any part of their ceremonials, the descriptions which I received bring out with sufficient clearness its similarities to the winter ceremonial of the Kwakiutl. The ceremonials seem to be almost identical among all these tribes. It is most complete among the southwestern Tsimshian tribes, particularly the G'itsa'la, but has been adopted by all the tribes of the coast. It is said that it reached the Haida not more than a hundred years ago.

I will tell here what I learned from the Nisqa'. They have six societies, which rank in the following order: The sxmhalei't, mi'la', ts'ilx'm, dlaix', nanstd'i't, hanana'i, the last being the highest. The sxmhalei't is really not confined to the winter ceremonial, but is obtained when a person acquires the first guardian spirit of his clan and performs the ceremony belonging to this event. The tradition of the origin of these ceremonies localizes the events at Bellabella, and it

[1] See "Indianische Sagen von der Nord-Pacifischen Küste Amerikas," page 311, by F. Boas.

One of Hamatsa's principal functions is that of acting as leader of the Tsetsaut dances of the supernatural beings. As already described, these take place in Waumis, the name of which is changed to Nuqualmaxa for the occasion, while the supernatural cases are awaiting Hamatsa's entry at the winter solstice. As soon as he comes, his curtains have caused most of his guests to rush forth. Among those remaining is Sisauldaka, the Lawyer, his chief adviser in Tsetsaut matters. This being is somewhat individually regarded as a supernatural grizzly bear. He is subordinate to Hamatsa, and cannot himself initiate proposals, but he can interrupt the speeches of his superior if he feels bold. Human singers are under his special guidance. He is so powerful that if he raises his head in anger at any marvel, the latter falls dead. As far as could be learned, Sisauldaka is concerned only with Tsetsaut matters and never visits this earth.

One of the most intangible of the Bella Coola supernatural beings is a woman, Kimsaqa, Mistle, "The Snow-Maker" or Tsi Sisauldi, "The Slave-Owner." Boas (p. 68) recorded fairly definite information about her, but the writer could gather only inconsequential fragments. Mortals are as slaves to her, but she takes little interest either in their welfare or actions. In the beginning of time, Hamatsa sent her down to earth to watch the behaviour of mortals and report to him. She needed a central location for this purpose and accordingly chose Restoration Bay, where she could watch the canoes as they passed up and down the coast. At first the inhabitants of the earth showed her great respect, but gradually she was ignored and canoes passed her home without stopping. Moreover, she began to fear that she might be injured by the proximity of mankind, and especially that human footsteps might contaminate and mar her supernatural frame. So she fled far to the south, whither no one knows. In fact, no one is even absolutely certain that she went to the south. According to a well-known Bella Coola tradition, a man once tried to climb Mount Nuqalz and found a pleasant grassy place near *556 Island chief was felt by the Bella Coola to be quite natural; 548 one of their own chiefs might have resented the insult in the same manner. This account may have no historical basis, but it is a clear example of Bella Coola sentiment.

*556 Further examples may help to clarify this point. A few 648 years ago a number of Kwakiutl Indians visited Bella Coola 558 to perform a mourning ceremony in honour of a deceased Bella 76 Coola who had a Kwakiutl name from his grandfather, a member of that tribe. All the natives was invited to a large house, where the visitors gave a dance according to their own ancestral myths; the songs which were used recounted the history of the Kwakiutl name of the dead man. After thus displaying their prerogatives, they felt themselves obliged, and proud, as hosts, to give presents as validation. The sum of $546 was distributed among the guests. Realizing that it would be impossible to return such a sum by holding ceremonials in Fort Rupert, the home of the Kwakiutl, the leading Bella Coola decided to return the compliment immediately. The amount to be given was discussed at great length. Appreciating the courtesy of the foreigners in thus coming to pay honour to the deceased, it was not wished to insult them by giving a larger present, which would have had the effect of intimating that the recipients considered the $546 a trifling amount. Accordingly it was finally agreed to give the visitors about $300, which was done as validation of a Bella Coola ceremony at which the strangers were present. Thus the hosts allowed themselves to be shamed as a mark of courtesy. Not to be outdone in politeness, the Kwakiutl chief made a speech, expressing his willingness to allow the Bella Coola to drive him (this occurred in the days of horses and carts) to the wharf to take the steamer. In other words, he allowed the Bella Coola to put him in their debt, as they had allowed him and his party to do with respect to the distribution of money. The visit terminated with friendly relations maintained on both sides.

129 The need of validating every ceremonial act by presents
523 can be further illustrated by the following instance. When the writer was in Bella Coola, a non-ceremonial entertainment was given one evening at which several men sang and performed. The writer was asked to sing a Bella Coola song, which he did in the belief that it was not one that was incorporated in the ancestral myth of anyone. Unfortunately, his teacher had erred, and as soon as the song was completed an old woman arose and stated that it belonged to her ancestral family. She avoided the difficulty of its singing by immediately announcing that the singer was her "son." Thus the writer was adopted into a Bella Coola family, a circumstance which aided him considerably in collecting information. This did not alter the fact that a ceremonial song had been sung. Accordingly, the woman gave presents to the guests, thereby legalizing the adoption, and saving herself from the disgrace of having one of her songs used as if it were a matter of no consequence, free to anyone. 128 538 556 424 [597]

SEATING

Presents are also a means of obtaining seats. Every Bella Coola has at least one name embodied in an ancient myth. A man who wishes to become a chief can do so only by giving lavish presents to make his designation "strong," "firm," or "bright," to use Bella Coola expressions. Such gifts increase the importance of the owner's name, and they obtain for him the right to a seat, more or less definitely located, in the house. Since all Bella Coola habitations are built on similar lines, a man can occupy his wonted position when summoned to a ceremony in any house. The validating of ancestral names and the acquisition of seats are among the important features which occur at potlatches. 554 556* [622] [424] [553]

In the beginning of time, when the first people were sent down to populate the earth, it is assumed that each who established a village, consisting of a single house, seated himself in the best spot within the dwelling, namely the central position behind the fire; his younger relatives ranged either beside him [773]

556 words and forwards away the contraries with shouting and movement, and those who have failed to carry away their bones of food hasten to remove them out of the danger zone. It is a time of licence, and even one of the most influential chiefs may be struck by the rum or his food scattered without consideration. The rum is driven back, but those who bear it steer the log so that instead of passing out through the door it strikes the front wall, shattering some of the boards with their old paintings. With a shout they drive forwards again until part of the wall at the back of the house is likewise destroyed. Then those within the house gain the mastery and the log is carried outside, dragging its struggling bearers with it. They drop the log and return inside as if nothing untoward had occurred. This destruction of the house walls is a necessary preparation for their replacement with new paintings on new boards. When quiet has been restored a herald stands up.

"Listen!" he cries. "Ye chiefs, ye wives of chiefs, and ye commoners, soon we shall hear the supernatural beings."

533 535 575 556 Then the singers beat out the tune of any kwaiat. He whose song it is begins to dance, using the type of which he has the prerogative, but as the supernatural being with whom he has a ceremonial affinity is not present, the dance is not considered sacred. As soon as one kwaiat has finished, the tune of another is beaten, and he too dances. The singers change from kwaiat to kwaiat, and please themselves about the order in which they shall dance, also about how many shall perform. This continues until late in the night. Then they beat out a nuaak tune and the member of that society to whom it belongs performs his dance, a non-sacred affair, like those of the kwaiat. One after another dances as his or her tune is beaten out, until dawn approaches. Meanwhile several nuaak have been sent outside with a number of the large cone-shaped whistles used for nawak ceremonial. Towards dawn, sounds come from them, and sometimes a dull thump is heard on the roof, as if a heavy being had landed there. At once there is great excitement within the house. The voices of supernatural people prove there to be at hand. No one is allowed to leave except a nawak sibi[1] who is skilled in dealing with Mulabela,[2] also called Sisiutpawan, the supernatural being closely connected with the nawak ritual. Those within can hear the voice of the sibi raised as if he were speaking to someone at a distance.

"Chief, you have come too early," he says. "The house is not yet ready. Please return later."

He is answered by loud whistling, which grows fainter, as if the being who made it were moving away. In reality the young men are merely blowing less forcibly into the whistles.

[1] The accounts of all informants agree that much of the nawak ritual was newly imported into Bella Coola from Bella Bella. According to some statements, Pahlas, a Bella Coola chief who died between 1870 and 1880, married a Bella Bella wife, also spoke from Rivers Inlet, and it was these two women who brought with them an elaborate certain nawak propagation. It is said that previous to that time the Bella Coola did not understand the use of the large cone-shaped whistles, nor were they able to summon the supernatural beings to the youths secluded in the back-room, nor to dispel the beings at the conclusion of the rites. On the other hand, some Bella Coola claim that their first ancestors brought the whistles with them from the land above. It is probable that the calling in of the supernatural beings is a recent addition to the pattern, which accounts for the contradictory accounts, but whether or not the whistles are a new feature is more doubtful. It appears certain that the propagation of sibi has recently been obtained from the Bella Bella. Sibi means "the man who cures," and the name is given to the man whose propagation it is to send the hamat initiates in whom supernatural powers are located. In Bella Bella there is a similar functionary for nawak matters, known as a hai-ahbida. Through intermarriage several Bella Coola have recently obtained this propagation; in each case it is frankly stated that it has been derived from the Bella Bella. The Bella Coola apply to them, as favoured, the term sibi, as they do for the hamat "cures," though the Bella Bella name, hai-ahbida, is used with equal frequency. The present sibi have endeavoured to claim for themselves certain ceremonial functions formerly carried out by any nawak. In this account of a potlatch it is assumed that a sibi is functioning on all occasions, but in many cases any senior nawak is considered sufficiently close to the supernatural beings to act satisfactorily. Until about 1870 it is clear that any nawak was regarded as capable of doing so.

request X to have his son initiated, promising him financial assistance.

These preliminaries have probably been commenced before sunrise; at any rate they are completed as soon as possible, so that a few nights later X is able to instruct a herald to invite the zuzek to his house. The singers are in attendance. The father, or other relative, of one of those about to be received into the ranks of the zuzek, expounds in general terms the ancestral myth containing the name to be conferred, or will ask a fluent speaker to depute for him. Another follows, until myths have been recited for all. The singers listen attentively, knowing that without further instruction they are expected to compose two songs for each person, embodying a few salient points in the myth, without exposing the details. In point of fact, the singers have probably heard the myth on previous occasions. After a distribution of food, provided by X, the people disperse.

For several days the singers work at the songs. The principles governing their composition are identical for all types. At night, as he walks in the forest, or at any other time, a singer constantly tries to compose a tune. Others do the same, and at intervals they meet, either in some lonely spot or in the back-room of a house. Each singer who has composed a tune beats out its time, humming as he does so; then another gives his tune, and perhaps a third. After much discussion, which in some cases becomes acrimonious, it is decided what two tunes are the best for so-and-so. Words are then supplied, a matter of less difficulty, all the singers assisting. In this way the fourteen songs required are provided. When ready, one of the singers informs X of the fact.

X decides that on a certain night two of the initiates shall begin a period of confinement in the back-room of his house. This information is passed round in secret by the zuzek, and the initiate, whom it will be convenient to refer to as Y, is duly warned. At dusk a reliable zuzek is sent out to the woods behind the village with one of the large cone-shaped whistles.

533 This is promptly heard. Y may be in his own house, but 556 once any number of nusal rush in and conduct him, unassisted 575 in their midst, to the back-room of X's dwelling. All the nusal of the village begin to gather there; those who are not members of the society are also free to enter the main part of the house, though they cannot take any part in the proceeding.
[781] They lurk near the door, watching with intense mixed wit fear, and ready to flee if the danger from supernatural beings seems too acute.

After some delay, a whistle is heard at intervals, gradually becoming louder as if the supernatural being, of which it is the voice, were coming nearer. Presently it sounds immediately outside the door, and a sisi rushes forth. He returns in a moment, followed, amid the breathless excitement of the uni-[592] tiated, by a figure masked as a bird or animal. The design represents Y's crest, or some creature with which one of his ancestors came in contact, and which is therefore regarded as having the same sociological importance. A member of the society has carved the mask, another wears it, but this the uninitiated do not know.

[776] "It is a tsiwinam,"[10] they gasp.

The figure crouches thoughtfully and bends down beside the singers to whom it appears to be whispering. Presently they begin, softly, to tap out a song in rapid time as if the supernatural visitor had just taught it to them. It is divided into two or three parts and the theme is taken from Y's ancestral myth.[11] After two or three rehearsals, the singers beat out the time more loudly and accompany it with their voices, while [535] the masked figure dances. A number of older nusal accompany the performer as he whirls around the house; it is pretended that this is necessary to shield the spectators, though the real function is to guide the dancer whose sight is handicapped by the mask. If the tutwinam represents Wasp[10] or Grizzly Bear, he does not make a circuit and a fluent susak explains that to do so would be unsafe owing to the ferocity of these animals. When the song is ended, the figure passes into the back-room. After a short interval it reappears, recrosses the house, and leaves by the front door, to the accompaniment of increased whistling.

[10] Meaning, "What is displayed," or, "A materialization."

[11] If the nuqkyu is a son or other near relative of the chief who is giving the potlatch, the theme may consist of boasting references to the goods about to be distributed. This is customary for X himself if he performs as a nusal at the actual ceremony.

A few myths embody two tutwinam. In this case, a second figure presently enters and the same ritual is repeated for a second song. This usually differs, musically, from the first, being in three parts and with even more rapid time. More often, the second song is merely beaten out by the singers without the appearance of a tutwinam to supply an obvious source.

This is the normal, but not the only practice with regard to a tutwinam. In some cases the figure does not appear until after the singing of the first song, and the uninitiated are told that it has been attracted by the music. In this case it passes into the back-room, later to reappear and leave by the front door. An announcement is made that it has brought a strange power, that Y has become peculiar, and that his name is now, for example, Quaquasila. A herald bears this news through the village. A second song is then sung in due course.

[776]

The tutwinam is difficult to classify among Bella Coola supernatural beings. It appears in the form of an ancestral crest, but the susak do not seem to have taught the uninitiated to regard it as Y's actual forefather. It remains as a supernatural embodiment of his crest, a materialization of an element of family history, and a motive for the use by Y of a mask representing the apparition. The uninitiated do not seek further; they have seen a wonderful sight and are content.

[177

Several of the older susak stated that the tutwinam concept was not indigenous to Bella Coola; it had been recently

556 adopted, probably as a prerogative obtained through mar-
575 riage, from the Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people. The diver-
177 sity in ritual supports this view. There was not sufficient [796] time for the procedure to become stabilized between the introduction of the concept and the dislocation of Bella Coola social life through the influence of the white man. It is also possible that the tutuiwam was added to susak rites from the older a'alt society (I, p. 273).

532 Whatever may have been the history of the tutuiwam, it
556 provides Y with a mask, or with two, if two figures have ap-575 peared. He guards them jealously, though secretly, throughout his life and uses them only on rare ceremonial occasions.
[969] It is one of these masks which will be brought out if one of his family gives a dramatic representation of his return after death.
[428] A mask of this type is sometimes willed, but the legatee alters the design before using it.

556 A short pause follows the singing of the second, or third,
575 song, during which some chief or chiefs may make a laudatory speech concerning Y's family history. Then the singers again [537] sing the first song, and susak members of the audience join in.
[533] Similarly, the second song is practised. These two are sung, time after time, until the susak have thoroughly mastered them. When the singers consider that this has been accomplished, they tell X, who communicates with the susak man outside who has the whistle, and again its eerie notes are heard.
[781] Some of the uninitiated, believing that the supernatural being who gives potency to the ritual is at hand, hurriedly leave in fear. At the same time some of the susak conduct to the backroom the second initiate whose songs are to be sung that night.
The procedure in his case is identical with that described for Y.
Usually it is considered sufficient to seclude two on one night, though three may be attempted. When the songs of the last have been sung, food is distributed and the people disperse.

A few nights later the same ritual is repeated for two more initiates, who join their predecessors in the back-room. Here they spend their time in idleness, the only essential being the preservation of an air of mystery by keeping out of sight of 556* those who are not nusuk. Food is brought to them, and mem- 575 bers of the society are free to enter the room at any time. Some of the older ones enlighten Y and his fellows with regard to the secret rites, and especially to the human origin of the whistle. Proud of his new status, an initiate never dreams of transmitting this information to those who are not members of the society. As a privilege, the neophytes are sometimes allowed to go out at night, care being taken that no uninitiated person shall see them. The length of the period of confinement varies according to the number of young people to be admitted, and on the actual time of the potlatch; the minimum duration is about two weeks, the maximum, four months. Sometimes the tediousness is lightened by the arrival of carpenters who have chosen this secret place to work at the nusuk masks. After all the initiates have been confined to the back-room, X [533] continues to invite people to his house at frequent intervals to practise their songs. On each occasion food is distributed, so that the meetings are expensive to the host, but no donor grumbles about it, as thereby he establishes his prestige as a chief.

THE VALIDATION OF NUSUK NAMES

The next event is the validation of the initiates' nusuk 553 names,[18] a ceremony termed so'ooitlem. X, with the assis- 556* tance of his family, piles on the floor of his house the goods 575 which he intends to use for this purpose. In the old days these consisted of skins, blankets, food, baskets, boxes, slaves (symbolized by stones), canoes (symbolized by sticks), and so on. Nowadays, money is used. Towards dusk a herald summons [208] the people to X's house. For many years it has been customary to invite everyone, but it is said that long ago only the nusuk would have been present. When all are seated, [537]

[18] Validation of the neophytes' names is essential at the potlatch itself, but chiefs endeavour to display their wealth and generosity to their fellow-villagers as well. Consequently, though donors are eager to perform this rite, it can be omitted entirely without affecting the potlatch.

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, X expects that the presents, if any, made to a few individuals after the general distribution, will be returned with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been animated, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly nature by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly announced, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be.

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the initiates are practised. Members of the nuxalk society join in with the singers; the other spectators listen attentively, full of interest, but take no part. X with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart.

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare event, and nuxalk members were initiated at local gatherings. The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be convenient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, when the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place.

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out* the tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close succession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark decorated with pendant weasel skins, and the distinctive nuxalk head-dress (see Plate 15). This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion one after another of the concealed initiates, while the audience, consisting of nuxuk alone, join in the singing. As the sounds drift out to the guests, they too beat out some of their well-known nuxuk songs. 535 556 575

At high tide, as the canoes draw near, carefully guided by poles and saddles, the nuxuk troop down to the beach to meet the guests, led by a sibi, who alone wears an apron of puffin beaks and carries a rattle. The singers beat out one of his tunes and the sibi dances on the beach, while the supernatural whistle which has been sounding from the back room of X's house, is now heard at his side, blown by an assistant under cover of his blanket. After the sibi has danced, the singers among the guests, and there are always enough of them to make possible the beating out of the better known tunes, sing one of their sibi's songs as he dances on the platform surmounting the canoes. [292] [533]

The Bella Coola sibi, surrounded by a group of nuxuk, now begins to turn about in a frenzied manner, always sunwise, bending down, then straightening himself, twisting and writhing like a maniac. Finally, standing erect, he pretends to throw something to the foreign sibi, and then falls to the ground. The recipient makes the motion of catching something heavy, and at the same time one of his accomplices in the canoe sounds another nuxuk whistle, deluding the uninitiated observers into the belief that some power has been transmitted, which is the source of the strange noise. The visiting sibi revolves four times, twisting and bending, then straightens up and throws back his cloak, to expose a mask representing Mulakula. This has been concealed there all the time, but the uninitiated readily believe it to be the creature which has made the noise, or else that it is an object miraculously made by this being. The sibi revolves four times more, with the mask in plain sight and the whistle constantly booming, while a fluent speaker "explains" the meaning of it all to the uninitiated who are watching with interest from the background.

grease have been placed in readiness. X selects as many 556*
youths as the number on whom he intends to confer the names 575
which have already been announced and validated among the 553
Bella Coola, but are now to be made known to the foreign guests. He seats the lads, who are to substitute for the initiates, on the various boxes. Everybody understands that these are merely representatives. X requests two chiefs to act as his announcers, choosing two with good voices and abundant self-confidence. To one of these X whispers the nuxut name of one of the initiates.

"His name is now——" calls out the announcer, pointing to one of the substitutes, and the listeners readily recognize the initiate intended, from the use, in conjunction with his new designation, of his well-known ancestral name. The heralds repeat the new name with the usual badinage, so that it becomes well known to all present. In like manner the nuxut name given to each initiate is publicly announced. The substitutes receive no advantage from their part in the proceedings. [203]

Then the boxes are opened and red elderberries poured into 556*
the canoes in front of the guests. Stones are provided with 224 which the visitors pound the fruit into pulp which they proceed to mix with their hands, as olachen grease and cranberries [252] are added. Then X's helpers distribute spoons and the feast commences. All start to eat, but after an interval one of the leading Bella Coola chiefs strikes the side of his canoe with a spoon, as a signal that all must stop. X has several dishes in [415] readiness. If he is wealthy some of these will be carved in the [538] shape of beaver, eagle, or other form in which an ancestor appeared. These dishes are filled with the food which all have been eating and then placed before the principal chiefs, who thus have a second supply. At this point the singers begin to 533 beat out an ancient song of the type known as ne-tin. Each 556* of these has been handed down from the distant past, when some chief, ancestor of X, had it composed for himself at a potlatch. The theme is always about the form or fame of his [171]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

533 earliest ancestors, and the text is commonly grandiloquently 556 phrased.[19] Frequently the singers alter the words slightly to suit the occasion, and sometimes compose entirely new words
[71] for an old tune. As they sing, they are aided by some of X's friends who rise and stand between the fire and the front door.
[532] They occasionally wear forehead masks carved with his crest
to add dignity to the rite.

203 After the song the chiefs continue their meal, and there is much practical joking with the heralds.

522 "Don't you want some food?" X calls to one of them.

556 Without waiting for an answer he throws a box containing the liquid pulp, inclined at such an angle that the mess is spattered over the recipient. Occasionally, a herald will succeed in catching a box without spilling the contents, but usually he is smeared from head to foot, while the spectators shriek with laughter. It is one of the functions of a herald to be a laughing stock for the visitors.

556 During the afternoon X's wife and the members of her
583 family deliver to him the goods which they have amassed to "re-buy" her from her husband. These are called "washing material," as if they supplied X with wash-basin and toilet necessities. The speaker orates how the wife has lived up to her obligation in making this presentation, and how it will clear the path for her children. These goods will later on be distributed by X. They can be used for:

(1) Repayment of potlatch debts, or

(2) Making potlatch investments, or

(3) Validating names, either susook or ancestral, for the children of his relatives.

It would be most disgraceful should any of the goods be applied to validating susook names for any of X's own children, because they have come from his wife's people and react to the advantage of her children in any case. These goods are

*556 184 ings to reward carpenters and others who had helped X prepare for his potlatch, but in Bella Coola this was usually done the following night.

*556 769 535 575 [533] Now comes what the Bella Coola regard as the most important feature of the potlatch.[11] The singers strike up one of the songs of a senior sisaok, perhaps a siki chosen for his skill in acting. As he dances, clad in his ceremonial costume and head-dress, whistling is heard without the house. A number of sisaok are making the noise and they modulate it so that it appears to draw nearer and nearer. This is effected either with whistles of different sizes or by blowing harder. The dancer rushes out of the house. The whistling continues in a series of short bursts, as if a conversation were being carried on in that language. The sisaok or siki returns, and the audience, silenced by the mystery of the affair, listens to his explanation:

"It is so-and-so," he announces, using the ancestral name of one of X's deceased relatives. "The crest has come to pay his son [or whatever relation X may be to him] a visit. I will bring him in."

While he speaks, continuous whistling is heard from without, but when he leaves the house it once more takes on the form of a dialogue. Presently he returns, followed by a masked figure in the centre of a group of members of the sisaok society. If the deceased's first ancestor had been an eagle, in that guise [532] the figure will appear—an eagle mask on his head, and his whole body, except perhaps the feet, covered by a large blanket thickly covered with eagle down and furnished with painted wooden wings. The dancer is usually entirely blinded by this costume, but he is guided by a number of the sisaok whose presence is attributed to the necessity for guarding and paying honour to the supernatural visitor. Among those who accompany him there is always a man with a whistle, the note of [533] which simulates the cry of an eagle, and this is sounded at intervals. The actor bends in imitation of a bird and shakes [532] himself, lifting his head and opening the movable beak by

*556 chief to pay somewhat lavishly, since the value of the copper [435] depends on the amount expended on it.
[437] The $20 received by the poor man must not be casually spent. He is expected to invite the whole village to his house, *556 otherwise he would never again be given a copper. The heralds 735 call everyone to the house, the singers as usual being the first to arrive. They beat out the kusiut song of anyone, to which [533] the owner dances; the songs are used one after another, until [575] almost every member of the society has danced. Susack songs may then be used in the same way. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the rite has no religious significance; it is merely a social affair. At the close of the dancing, the poor man distributes food to all, equivalent in value to the money received. It is probable that poor men sometimes give away slightly less than they have received, although any noticeable laxity in this would be punished by the receipt of no further coppers. The recipient of a copper from a fire derives no direct gain from it, though it is to his indirect advantage, since a person who has given away food is likely to receive larger presents on future occasions than one who has not.

435 Meanwhile the chief owning the copper is unable to use it at his potlatch since the value, dependent on the goods ex-*556 pended for it, is only $20, a sum so small that to use it would be insulting to his dead ancestor. There are several ways of increasing its value:

(1) By Painting. Taking advantage of some ceremony [532] when a number of people are present, the owner gives a carpenter $10, for example, with a request that he paint on his copper a representation of the crest used by his, the owner's, first ancestor, when coming to this earth. Henceforth the value of the copper is $30.

435 (2) By Naming. The Bella Coola say that among the 552 Kwakiutl names are given to almost all coppers; in Bella *556 Coola it is a rare practice. Occasionally, a chief creates a name for his copper and validates this by presents to all the 701 than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize

156 in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of [463] a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

555 THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

533 either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose [463] songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unsubstantial, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and composi-
[553] tions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made [428] by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and [578] differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do. 556 575

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family. [533] 532 556 575

On the night of xlāxtnum, when the work for the potlatch is allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the ɬɩsaek initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the sikī, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with the type worn by ɬɩsaek, one of the many points of resemblance 556 575 [184] [535]

society and decline of the a'alk, concealment has become limited to initiates of the former organization. 556 575

No more a'alk dances take place during the potlatch preliminaries, but with the coming of the first group of foreign guests, the host displays as many types of dance as he is entitled to, including a'alk if he has the necessary prerogative. On this occasion other a'alk, especially relatives of the donor, give their dances, the only time that such are used at potlatches except by novices receiving names. This is repeated on the arrival of every party of guests. [178] 556 575 535

Meanwhile the novice, or novices, has been practising the proper steps for his appearance, which always occurs immediately before the entry of the masked figure representing the donor's dead relative. As already mentioned, there are four kinds of a'alk dances, known as nuqwal,[8] łłaiyākam, qi'aqa, and am'ła'a. A similar song is used for a dancer of any one of these four; the text describes some small incident of the ancestral myth in which the name occurs, such as the bringing down of the prerogative by the first incumbent in the beginning of time. At the proper moment, the singers beat this out and the audience joins them in singing it. Then the singers begin to strike rapidly on the floor with double beats, assisted by the guests who clap their hands in rapid couplets. Out comes the dancer, resplendent in his head-dress decorated with weasel skins, and women with the required prerogative begin to drone. If his prerogative is as a łłaiyākam or qi'aqa, he proceeds to a place beside the fire and begins to run around it, sunwise, in short mincing steps, revolving at the same time on himself. He clasps his hands behind his back and bends down, then stands upright with palms extended upwards, never ceasing to move his feet in rapid steps. This type of dance is far more violent than a nuqwal one, and the amount of energy expended by a dancer in his rapid circuits of the fire is tremendous. Never, even for a moment, are his feet quiet, while his body twists and bends in an amazing fashion. After two [533] [533]

556 or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The time beaten 575 out for a nusqwal or am'lel·a dancer is the same. He too comes 535 near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the [533] singers in unison bellow out, Wai··, "More." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clutched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the beating becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of Wai··, and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Here he revolves once more in the same furious fashion; the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Nusqwal and am'lel·a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience. This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

574 The occasion on which importance and solemnity are 575 attached to a'alk dances is during potlatches, but they are
535 also given at other times. Most Bella Coola performances are so steeped in the presence of the supernatural that the element of enjoyment is secondary, but in the spring, after the [796] end of the kusiut season and before the salmon come to the rivers, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A sisaok can call his fellows to his house and the singers beat out sisaok songs to which the owners dance, but the most common hosts are a'alk. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the heralds invite the guests in his a'alk name. Those summoned include both members of the society and those who are not. Any a'alk, provided that he has enough food for a meal, can call in his neighbours, but the one who usually does so is a man who has received his name a year or two before the occasion. 574 575 535

A few days before the time selected, the host asks the singers to compose a new song for him. For a nusqwal dancer particularly, and in some cases for any one of the other three divisions of the society, the text does not deal with incidents connected with the host's ancestral story, but with humorous or disgraceful incidents of the present time. If a man has caught ten salmon and kept them all for himself, his miserliness is commented upon in the song; if a wife has deserted her husband for another man, the actions of the two are mercilessly ridiculed; if a chief has failed to display generosity it is likewise recorded, and reference is made to errors in dance ritual. To do this is one of the functions of a nusqwal, and the singers are always ready to assist him. At the same time they often add a new incident to the tune belonging to some other a'alk dancer so that he too will be able to perform. In this way the airs are remembered from year to year, which is different from the customary Bella Coola usage. 575 574 535 533 [626]

On the morning of the day chosen, the host asks one of the singers to beat a drum repeatedly but slowly, as a signal that a non-ceremonial dance is about to take place. About noon, heralds go from house to house announcing who is to give the dance. In the late afternoon the people gather in the donor's house where men, women, and children seat themselves without distinction of rank, the only reserved place being that for the singers behind the fire. They beat out the host's tune and he dances to it, while the singers themselves sing the words to the amusement of the audience. Using their own discretion, they then beat out the tune of another a'alk and he also dances, followed in succession by a third, a fourth, and as many as the singers think fit. Sometimes the songs of susook are used in a similar manner. When many have danced, the host distributes food to all his guests, not forgetting to give the largest [202] [203]

575 574 535 [533] [525] [526] [178] presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the ssaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773 Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqual for his name Sinxälotla which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tlaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuxtl (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Tlaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539 The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[8] long, long ago, Äłqanäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sanaw-a, and a mortal; so he

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to susask, a'alk, or even kusiut. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small. 556 649 [484]

Although the most important Bella Coola dances are performed at potlatches or during the kusiut season, they are not confined to these periods. Professional singers do nothing else and, except during the run of salmon when everyone is busy fishing, a dance occurs every few nights. Supernatural beings are not called down; consequently there is little solemnity and everyone has a good time. On these occasions, kusiut songs are first beaten out, followed by susask and a'alk, and the owner 533 535 574

533 of each song dances to it. Anyone who has enough food to 535 provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such 574 an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs
[203] there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and [622] call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the [203] initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of [221] salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one [796] of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in the fishing. In the early autumn, when ber-
556 ries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn 796 to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign [221] guests, calls in his neighbours for a nusak dance and initiates
[575] some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual, described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch
[535] except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village [426] at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during [575] the early autumn, while in winter kwaiat dances take place [535] almost nightly. When they are over, it is time for the non-sacred variety of a'alk performances, and for another type of rite, nusāxKlmx.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

rite, nusäxkämx. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and indebtedness. February is the proper month for nusäxkämx, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use some of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a nusäxkämx dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a nusäxkämx name is not embodied in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Ťopiwac, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Qplon, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the 852 principal instructors, aided by the professional musicians.

867 Boys are always willing to act as singers for the practice they [533] receive, and the gifts they will acquire. Other lads are chosen to act as heralds, an effort being made in each case to pick those likely to pursue these professions.

[1196] The day finally selected for the ceremony is in February, on a date when nothing of importance is taking place. The juvenile heralds summon the child guests, who have been invited in accordance with the rules governing a potlatch, especial care being taken to omit none to whom the child donor is indebted. His father carefully instructs him in this matter, thus impressing on his son's mind one of the fundamental points of Bella Coola life. In the late afternoon, when all have [535] assembled, the boy singers beat out the donor's song and he dances to it. It may be in the nature of a sisaok, a'alk, or kusiut dance, according to the wishes of his parents. In many cases, one of the grandparents or some other old relative likewise dances to the song, using whatever style he chooses. There is no ceremonial significance to the ceremony and all enjoy themselves immensely, especially the adult guests. After
[556] the gifts have been handed round. The necessity for food and presents makes it impossible for any but the children of chiefs to enjoy this training.

After the ceremony, the children parade up and down the sidewalk in front of the houses, singing boisterously. The performance has been for their benefit and they wish to "show off." One night completes the affair, but the following afternoon another child may summon his comrades to a similar ceremony. The child singers first beat out the song of the present donor, then that of his predecessor, to which the latter dances once again. If food is plentiful, nusāxkāmɣ ceremonies may be carried out every day for several weeks, or a year or two may elapse without one. A child's song is remembered from year to year and he dances whenever it is beaten out. The name acquired in this way is used semi-jocularly by a lad's comrades. After marriage, it is considered unfitting for a youth to be concerned with nusāxkāmɣ and he normally becomes an a'alk.

Ceremonies of this kind have been discontinued for many years and it was impossible to obtain detailed accounts. The main features are clear: they served to instruct children in the methods of present-giving. According to one informant, there were two types of nusāxkāmɣ ceremonial; one of the humorous pattern above described in which, however, food alone was given away, and another in which miniature presents were distributed. This man believed that the latter was only possible for the children of wealthy chiefs, and that on such occasions the themes consisted of small incidents in the family myth. In either case, the importance of ceremonial can be judged from the manner in which it was impressed upon mere children.

Next morning they found a house in readiness for them, a short distance from the bank; its name was Nuwalqtnem, and it had been created for them by Alqunstm who had selected this spot for their residence. It resembled other houses except that the door was in a back corner instead of in the middle of the front because bears must not approach the river, and the five still had ursine characteristics. The salmon would have been frightened if they had lived too near. The paintings on the back walls were of Kingfisher. 539*

Chips from their firewood floated downstream to the point where Smaoaw (I, p. 332) lived. Judging that someone was encamped above him, he set out to investigate. He met Yoáks and entered into conversation with him, finally asking if he, Smaoaw, might marry Yoáks's sister, Sxlmdna, "The Light-Bearer." Yoáks agreed, and the two were married in due course. At this ceremony a marriage song given by Alqunstm was first used.[*] ʟyayyar and his brothers made a special kind of fish-trap, in which they caught large quantities of trout and steel-head salmon, and below them Smaoaw and his family were also catching large quantities of salmon. The two settlements combined to give a potlatch. The brothers built an extension to the house to accommodate their guests, and when all were seated a representation of a black bear emerged from the room at the back of the house, imitating the appearance and actions of its inmates when first they arrived on this earth. The artifacts brought by ʟyayyar and his brothers from above were displayed to the guests, as has since been done on similar occasions by their descendants. At this potlatch the name Nulqtnlain was given to Sxlmdna, having reference to the tabooed house with the rear doorway.

Yoáks once sent his kingfisher-herald up the river to discover whether or not there were people there, for at that time it was unknown country. He reported that there were, so Yoáks built a canoe, in the manner taught by Raven, and set off; en route he met the upstream settlers, who had likewise learnt the art of making canoes and were travelling downstream on an errand similar to his own.

The brothers used some of their wealth on one occasion to give a hamat dance, at which they validated for Nazqmlain the Breaker (II, p. 123) name, Nuwamdlain. This refers to the way in which he had flown with quivering wings when a kingfisher, and as he danced he shook his hands in imitation of this. This name had been given him by Alqunstm, as had also his third, Olqlimat, referring to his status as herald.

Smaoaw and Sxlmdna had many children who formed a bond between [582] [424] [533]

Ḷqwaaṭlm had given T̈lẗkwakila the honourable prerogative or duty of singing the mourning song whenever anyone died. When it was time for her to function she painted her face with a design representing a rough sea, and beat time on the floor with a stick, ḷqomkstas, on which were jingling copper bangles. The theme was how Raven had brought her help on all occasions.

Bc [424] [533]

The right to sing this song has since been preserved as a prerogative in the ancestral family descended from these four brothers. No name accompanies it, but the right must be validated by the giving of presents.

Early Traditions Having the Ceremonial Significance of Origin Myths

Bc 539*

The following are examples of myths which are used as authorization for potlatches even though they do not deal with the actual peopling of this earth. It will be noted that they describe the adventures of early settlers, and only with non-Bella Coola. All are claimed to have been obtained by intermarriage with the descendants of individuals mentioned in them.

Bc [179]

AN EARLY ʟ̓ʟ̓ʟ̓ʟ̓ MYTH[21]

BB 539

Not long after the first people had come to this earth, Raven taught an ʟ̓ʟ̓ʟ̓ʟ̓ chief, T̈ẗ-paaṭ by name, how to catch black cod with hook and line. It was summer at the time, and T̈ẗ-paaṭ began to make preparations for fishing early the following year. He instructed his wife to take three female assistants with her to the woods to collect a large quantity of cedar-bark for making the line, which had to be at least three hundred yards in length, owing to the depth at which black cod are found in Labouchere Channel. The four women returned four days later with a large amount of the material, on which they worked all summer and the following winter. Meanwhile T̈ẗ-paaṭ, with three other men to help him, was busy manufacturing hooks of the usual British Columbia type. They were made from the knots of dead and fallen hemlocks; the interior was first cut out, bent into the desired shape, smeared with mountain 585 handles of the rattles"; symbolizing that they are pads to protect the hands, though the dancers derive no benefit from the pelts, which are stacked with others for later distribution to Y's family. A large amount of provisions has been prepared and placed in boxes, one for each member of Y's family. In many cases it is difficult to estimate how much food will be required, and if there is a surplus, it is eaten by the performers and other assistants.

When all are ready they rush forth; dancers, dancers' assistants, and young relatives of X, followed more sedately by his father. The rest of the villagers watch with interest, but do not take part in the ceremony. Choosing a position outside Y's house, the singers beat the time of the marriage [533] song used by X's ancestors; if the words are known they sing [424] them. Like the prerogative of marriage dancers, there may [426] not be a marriage song embodied in every origin myth, but if X lacks such he is usually able to borrow one.[1] The keeper of the song is stationed near the singers, ready to help them with the words or the tune, if necessary. Meanwhile the [535] dancers are performing on the sidewalk outside Y's house. Each uses whatever type of dance he chooses, kusiut, nsaok, a'alk, or even shaman's, but all dance simultaneously, though without paying greater attention to each other than is [533] necessary to avoid collisions. The professional droners accompany the singing with their high-pitched quaver.

Meanwhile Y's father, surrounded by his relatives and friends, waits in readiness within their house. Y herself is

[1] The reputed origin of marriage songs has been described in vol. I, chap. vi. They are less strongly preserved as prerogatives than most elements of origin myths; in fact some keepers of the songs are willing to perform at any wedding, although this may be a modern development. The keeper, either man or woman, is chosen by [614] the senior members of the ancestral family, after discussion with the singers. It is his duty to remember text and tune, and the only pecuniary advantage is from the presents made by those to whom he teaches it. Some songs have words, others only a tune. The text of a song brought down by Alpuntsin to Snaslaiti is:

"Hello, Snaslaiti! We do as we have done before. Please make good the path for those who are about to marry."

Alpuntsin obtained this song from his heavenly namesake and used it at his own marriage, as his male descendants have since done.

585 to the others in succession. If Y's father is not wealthy, he may dispense with presents to the dancers, who before long cease of their own accord. When the song is finished, more strips of goat-skin are thrown in the manner already described. Then the song is sung for the third time, accompanied by the dancers who have not been "stopped" by the receipt of gifts. Again Y's father's friend brings out presents, to "stop" more of the dancers. After another disposal of goat-skin, and a fourth singing, all have been "stopped." Care is taken that at least one dancer is left to accompany the fourth singing of the song.

X's relatives now send in valuable presents to Y, her father, mother, and other relatives, and also to those who wish to associate themselves with Y's father in the marriage transaction, prompted by kindly feelings towards him, or, it may be, through a desire to display publicly their wealth and importance. The number of these individuals has been communicated secretly to X's kinsmen, who are thus able to send a present to each, such as a canoe, a slave, a marten, lynx, or goat-skin blanket, or some equally treasured object. These gifts are called "weapons of war," since the assumption is that X is acting like a warrior in taking something of value from Y's family. At the same time the goods that Y's father has given to stop the dancers are returned to him unostentatiously.

Y's father now invites X's party into his house by calling out:

"Omap winas, omap ททททมy," "Enter you war-party, enter ye chiefs."

They go into the house and sit in a group in the place of honour behind the fire. Some of the other villagers may crowd in to watch, remaining near the front door, but having no part in the proceedings. Y's father superintends a distribution of food to his guests, sometimes a lavish feast, at other times a small meal, depending on the food supply and time of year.

[533] In many cases, though not always, Y's father sings a xe-tla song at this juncture, emphasising the importance of his ancestry.

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announcement was made: 553 556 583

"Y's belt has come to rebuy her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after amassing goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's anus has come to rebuy her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Snuklt-tl have the prerogative of singing a special song as they rebuy one of their daughters. This was used by their first ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is: [424] [533]

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Snuklt-tl is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them. [186]

After announcing the various relatives who have rebought Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551 553

to kill an enemy, but his success is accredited to his supernatural possessions which have given him skill as a warrior rather than to his own ability. 761 726

It is felt that no ordinary explanation is sufficient to account for the death of a great chief. No matter what may have been the actual cause, it is always said that the supernatural Carpenters, who in the beginning of time created mankind, came down and "seized" or "called back" the deceased, thinking him too good for this world. It is believed that these beings are keen hunters, and that Alquntăm allows them to pursue influential people. This sentiment is always expressed in mourning songs for a dead chief, but although accepted as a matter of fact, it is little more than a formalized belief which serves to comfort the mourners. The infraction of a taboo is another reason frequently given for a chief's death. It is said that there was a loud crash and the earth shook before the death of Potlus; he became ill immediately, and his stomach began to swell. The stricken chief said that Song" itself had fallen upon him, but the common belief was that he had erred in some ritual act. At any rate, he died within a few hours. 761 622 [773] [533]

RITES FOLLOWING DEATH

News of a critical illness spreads rapidly through the village and the house in which the sufferer is lying becomes a rendezvous for friends asking about his condition. Failure to do so would be considered ungracious, with the result that there is such a constant coming and going that rest is denied the sick person. Shamans are called upon to practise their powers in a noisy manner, and female relatives weep and wail. The din is indescribable. 763 [756]

When the patient shows no further indication of life, the shamans cease, but the women redouble their cries. Relatives, friends, and sympathizers all crowd into the house and begin to weep, often adding verbal lamentations. The progress of the news from house to house can be traced by the wailings. 766 575 but even if unaware of the fact, they realize that some super-[776] natural, invisible visitor has arrived.

Heralds go from house to house, and sometimes to adjacent [203] villages as well,[1] inviting the people to pay a farewell visit to [628] the dead man who will soon leave them; in this invitation the sisaok name of the deceased is used. The guests assemble at once, irrespective of their rank or membership in the sisaok society. To mark their grief, female relatives pull out tufts of their hair, and both men and women of the immediate family [302] cut their hair short. The body, either in its coffin or covered with blankets, is placed between the central fire and the back-room, immediately behind the place where the singers take their stations. When all are present, a son or other near rela-
[537] tive who is also a fluent speaker, stands up and expounds how the Chief, meaning Mulakila, has come to visit the dead man, 533 and how all should try to understand the song he has brought.[2]
575 A hidden sisaok has been blowing a whistle intermittently, and 766 the singers pretend to be able to understand words of a song in its notes. In reality they have prepared in advance the new one which they now beat out, accompanied by their voices. The theme either describes the coming of the supernatural visitor, or recounts the number of potlatches given by the deceased, and the manner in which these will make smooth the path whither he is going in the same way that distributed goods validate a chief's seat in this world. This song is practised and improved upon amid the booming of the whistle as if the singers were constantly gaining new ideas and embellishments from the words of the supernatural visitor. Sometimes a few incidents are added from the sisaok myth. After several repetitions, a relative of the dead man asks the singers to beat out the latter's sisaok songs, as many of them as are remembered from the time he was first initiated into the so-

[2]Sometimes the people are present when the coming of Mulakila, heralded by [184] whistling and a thump on the roof, takes place. There are variations in this, as in all other sisaok rites.

ciety. These are given several times, serving to recall the 533 ceremonies in which the chief took part during his life. At 575 intervals, the new song is repeated and sisaok members of the 766 audience join in as they become familiar with the words. Frequently one or more relatives of the deceased dance in his [535]
stead during the singing. The details of this rite, especially of the songs used at it, differ considerably according to the actions of the person during life; if a mighty chief, the donor of many potlatches, this fact is described in the song, whereas only an incident from the ancestral myth can be used for a young sisaok. If some of his female relatives are professional [767]
wailers, they function during the ceremony. In all circumstances, the rite aims to comfort the grieving kinsmen, an end which it usually achieves.

As already described, sisaok ceremonial was in a state of 575 transition at the time of the coming of the white man. Pre- 766
vious to that date, a spectacular funeral prerogative had been 177
adopted from Rivers Inlet,[4] which has since been claimed by a 424 number of sisaok. All the Bella Coola know of this ceremony, [178]
and most of them desire to perform it at the death of a dearly loved relative; at the present time this is possible owing to the slight regard paid to prerogatives, but it is certain that a few years ago it would have been forbidden to most people, and that it was never a universal Bella Coola rite.

When this rite is performed, the corpse is allowed to remain 575
in its coffin for at least one night after the day on which 766 Mutlakila came and the sisaok songs were sung. Meanwhile 532
the carpenters have prepared an imitation body, usually of rags on a light framework, and a wooden representation of the deceased's crest. Since this figure is to come through the roof and carry aloft the corpse, stout hooks are attached to its feet.
In theory, the bird or animal disguise used by the first ancestor

[4] One old Bella Coola stated that this prerogative was obtained during his own life-time from a Rivers Inlet chief who moved to Tăl·is. It is impossible to state accurately when this ritual was adopted by the Bella Coola, though it is unquestionably of recent origin.

764 grave carrying a spruce bough in his hand. He touches with it the edge where he is standing, then, in sunwise order, the east, south, and west margins. This circuit is repeated four times and the branch tossed away to westward. This essential [774] ceremony is based on a belief that the lives, or perhaps the spirits, of the grave-diggers have been drawn from them into the grave and are in danger of being pressed down by the coffin. Should this occur, they would have short lives. The spruce branch enables the supernatural elements to leave the cavity and return to their owners who suffer no ill effects. Anyone, other than a grave-digger, can perform this rite.

The coffin is now lifted into the grave, care being taken that the corpse faces east. As already described, it is in a squatting position with haunches almost on the ground. Boards have been prepared in advance, and with these the grave-diggers make a roof-like covering, placing at each corner [775] a stone weighing from ten to fifteen pounds, to prevent the ghost from returning to trouble the survivors. Earth is thrown in on top of the boards, and as it falls the wailing breaks out dolorously in a final crescendo of mourning. [766] If a chief has been buried, his fellows sometimes sing a xe·tla [533] song. At this time it is proper for one or more chiefs to rise and speak. No one is required to do so, nor is there any rule 537 as to the order in which they make their remarks. The first 764 speaker is usually a prominent man related to the survivors, though seldom a son, brother, or other near relative of the deceased. A speech is generally addressed in part to the spirit of the dead person, telling it where to go; in part, to the mourners. For a dead child, emphasis is laid on the fact that although he did not live long enough to be incorporated into his ancestral myths on earth, this will be done for him in his future home. In conclusion, an appeal is often made to [775] Alquntäm, under the name of Smaialotla, to take pains that [773] the spirit of the dead is given its rightful place in Nusmät·a, in the section where its first forbears were created, and whither the spirits of its dead ancestors have returned since the beginning of time.

*556 769 diate family. Confusion is probable only when a chief is bereaved after he has stored up goods and made preliminary preparations for a potlatch; he may then carry out the rites intended, but designate the ceremony a memorial potlatch. [575] More often, however, the affair is limited to rites associated with the deceased. Consequently, there is omission of the initiation of neophytes into the ɹsaok and a'alk societies,[22] there is no establishment of new seats for young relatives of the donor, and no strengthening of his own. It must be emphasized once more that there is no unalterable sequence of prescribed rituals at either potlatch or memorial potlatch; the omissions just mentioned are customary, not universal, and when present the ritual of the two ceremonies is identical. Except on those rare occasions when omitted at a potlatch, the return of a dead relative is the central feature of both.

[178] In recent years, the great increase in wealth has made it possible for a chief to perform a memorial potlatch soon after the death of an esteemed relative. This was rarely the case in former times, but as there was no other reason for which valuables were so ardently desired, every expedient was used to obtain the necessary goods. Occasionally, a chief happened to have the needful goods stored up so that he could give a memorial potlatch almost immediately. To such a fortunate individual the term, yeotla, was applied, a word difficult to translate but combining the significances of rich, ready, fortunate, and revered.

[796] Memorial potlatches, like those of the ordinary kind, are usually held in the early autumn, though occasionally one may be postponed until after the kusiut season. When an intending donor has decided that he owns sufficient goods, he first calls in his fellow-chiefs and makes known his intentions, at the same time expounding in considerable detail the myths which [533] he proposes to use as themes for mourning songs, and for other

[22] Performance of such rites at a memorial potlatch would be considered sinful by the Bella Bella and were always omitted during the period when their influence was important.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

prerogatives connected with the ceremony. The actual re- 556*
counting of the myths may be done by a fluent speaker on 769
behalf of the bereaved man, and when he has finished speaking, [533]
it is proper for several of his peers to make complimentary speeches, lauding the future donor for his intentions. Food is [537]
then served and the gathering breaks up.

The preliminaries of a memorial potlatch do not differ from those of an ordinary one. There is the same counting and recounting of goods, the same giving and receiving of presents, the same lending and borrowing. When at last the donor is ready, the heralds call his fellow-villagers to his house for announcement of the arrangements and allotment of the work. As at a potlatch, food is provided on a lavish scale, and there is the same sham-fight with a battering-ram ending in the destruction of part of the house. Then the carpenters receive their instructions; some to make different sections of the new structure, some to paint ancestral designs on the front and back walls, and some to make the various objects required.

The first difference between a memorial and an ordinary 211
potlatch is apparent at this allotment of work. Instead of a 556*
totem-pole to record the glories of the donor's ancestry,[22] car- 764
penters are requested to make memorial-posts for the dead 769 relative who is being commemorated. These are erected in the cemetery near the grave and are of three kinds, although it is unusual for all three to be set up for a single chief.

The first consists of a wooden post carved with the design of one or more of the deceased's crests (see Plates 19 and 20). [532]
These figures are usually representations of the bird or animal cloaks used by his first ancestors; it is customary to portray the one traced through the father on the right, that traced through the mother on the left. Instead of a cloak, the figure may portray the post down which swarmed his first ancestor in the beginning of time, or Mount Nusdalst in human form, wearing a broad-rimmed hat as he did before he turned to

*556 769 messengers may be marked with the same ritual as at a potlatch, but there is always curtailment of susaok features if rites of that nature are to be omitted.

Meanwhile other preparations have not been neglected. 424 Among the prerogatives embodied in many origin myths, is that of the presence of professional mourners at memorial *556 769 potlatches. If mention of these is made in the ancient tradition of the donor's ancestral family, it is a matter of pride for [767] him to do as was done by his ancestors in the distant past. For example, it may be recorded that at the memorial potlatch of some ancient chief, a number of his younger relatives appeared with red paint smeared upon their faces, with finely chopped undyed cedar-bark in the hair, or with bands of the [765] same material across their heads. Ālquntäm had decreed that they should thus exhibit their grief, and the descendants of the chief have since had the privilege of doing likewise. Such signs of mourning may not, however, be worn without proper validation. It is only the members of the ancestral family who are entitled to don these marks, and among them, only those whose right has been confirmed by the distribution of presents. This is a masculine professional prerogative, known [562] by the same name as the feminine one of uttering a droning cry to which it is closely akin. The right is ratified at memorial potlatches, and the donor of one is glad to do so as a means of displaying his own wealth as well as of making plain the glory of his ancestors to whom the one being commemorated has [767] returned. There is no mention of professional mourners in the myths of many families, nor are they ever as important in [171] Bella Coola as among the Bella Bella and other tribes of the outer coast. If such belong to the family of the donor, he notifies the incumbents and asks them to be ready, although, eager to act, they seldom wait for such an invitation.

533 The most difficult task is the preparation of mourning songs *556 769 at which the singers toil for several weeks. The donor first invites them to his house and recounts the myths from which they must be composed. These may include several traditions of different ancestral families to which the deceased belonged, 533 irrespective of whether or not he had used a name from one. 556

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Being a member of the group, its songs can legally be used in 769 his honour. Elements from different myths are often combined into one composition, corresponding to the different localities and characters which the dead person has visited in travelling back the path of his multiple ancestors to the beginning of time. If one person only is being commemorated, four [801] songs are prepared; if several, two are used for each. Three for any individual is unlucky. Two types, skwanät and änultınänk, are in common usage, and the singers, after conversation with the donor of the ceremony, decide which shall be employed. The former describes in some detail features from one or more of the deceased's ancestral myths, mentions the journey which he has taken to visit the individuals and scenes referred to, and calls on him to assume the form of his first forefather. A common theme is to state the origin of his name, and how he loved it so greatly that he left the earth to follow it back through time and space. The following is an abbreviated version of such a song, based on the origin myth of Käliäkıs:

"We have been unable to satisfy you here. Go whither Käliäkıs came, and become a raven. Go to the east and get abalone-shell; go to the west and get copper. They will satisfy you."

Another skwanät of the same type is:

"Your first ancestor circled the world with the aid of an abalone-shell paddle. Do you likewise. That will gratify you as nothing on earth could do."

On the other hand, an änultınänk seldom refers to the ancestral history of the deceased, but to his actions during life. It records the number of slaves, canoes, and other valuables given away at potlatches,[35] and alludes to other praiseworthy actions. This type of mourning song, though usually used [622]

[35]An analogous method of making known a man's distribution of wealth is by a written sign over his door (see Plate 24).

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

533 only for a chief, can be employed for a dead child. In this case, *556 the theme describes the efforts of the parents to incorporate 769 the deceased in the traditions of their ancestors, and the [622] number of times he had been ceremonially married. The text of one used a few years ago is:

"We said, Hail! Sınxälotła [the child's crest was the Sun] when she was born. What more could we have done? Why did she leave us?"

The text may refer to the prerogative of employing mourners, as in the following:

"Come ye professional mourners, help me to give voice to my lamentations."

The tunes of mourning songs are usually remembered from year to year, and the singers may merely alter words to make an old song applicable. In some cases, such compositions are [424] changed so slightly that they become virtually possessions of an ancestral family, and may then be preserved for generations until even the history of the names embodied is forgotten.
[174] Occasionally, ancient relationship between two such groups can be deduced from the occurrence of the same names in their mourning songs, although all traditions of intermarriage have been forgotten. There is considerable difference between the tunes of skwanät and änultunänk; in fact, this distinction may be more important than the themes, since the latter do not invariably conform to the types just described. A few items of ancestral history may be incorporated into a song dealing primarily with the actions of the deceased and vice versa. Sometimes four of one type are used, sometimes two of each. Much thought is devoted to the compositions, the singers meeting every day to try over and improve one another's efforts. The texts, long and complicated, require much practice, since any error would be an admission of gross inefficiency. These daily rehearsals take place in the donor's house and he is required to provide food for the singers. It is not uncommon to use a [177] song of Bella Bella origin, since the Bella Coola admit that members of that tribe excel in compositions of this type.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Such an adoption occurs only when the deceased was the owner of a Bella Bella myth and the song in question had been used to mourn a real or fictitious relative. It is contrary to custom to use the tune or words of a song not composed for a member of the deceased's ancestral family. 556* 769 [533]

The actual delivering of invitations by the envoys to the desired guests does not differ from the manner already described, except that they are asked "to come to visit the sick [donor]." The significance is, of course, that the mourner's condition is that of a patient. To indicate the reason of their visit, guests at a memorial potlatch always wear a little dyed cedar-bark around their heads. [177] [203] [292]

On arrival, the first party of foreign guests is conducted to the donor's house, where they make themselves comfortable in the section allotted to them by the heralds. An elderly Bella Coola chief who is a famous orator has been asked by the donor to speak, and he rises to do so as soon as his fellow-villagers have entered and taken their places. No set phrases are used, but the speaker usually begins by reminding all present of the way in which their ancestors were created in Nusmät·a, and how all must return thither. It is an occasion on which eloquence is essential, and the speaker delights in using as many archaic words and rhetorical expressions as possible, with constant references to religious beliefs and ancient history as recorded in mythology. Then he speaks of the death which is the occasion of the ceremony. If the deceased were an old man, he is referred to by a special term not in common usage, nudak·än, which implies wisdom and respect as well as extreme age. The orator states that he has fallen, using the term poyäx, normally applied to the thunderous crash of some mighty tree. He speaks of a young chief as sxwᵘllämkis, short-lived, a person who has been hunted down by the supernatural Carpenters. He continues by sketching the works of the deceased, the number of potlatches he gave and the manner in which his name was known to many tribes. Finally he tells of the donor's grief, and of how this "sickness" has been alle- 537 556* 769 [195]

537 viated by the presence of welcome guests. Mention is fre-
* 556 quently made of the journey taken by the dead man to the 769 scenes of his ancestral myths. In addition to being an orator, the speaker must also be a numitl chief, since it is felt that [622] none other can have the necessary assurance and poise to refer to these most sacred and important subjects. During the speech, assistants blow eagle down over the heads of all present.

Food has been prepared in advance, and as soon as the speaker has finished, the heralds call the guests to partake of it. The first course is then distributed, smoked salmon mixed [264] with olachen grease. Speeches are sometimes delivered during this part of the meal, as well as at the second course, cranberries with more olachen grease. If the guests have arrived during the afternoon, there is no delay between the feast and the ritual that follows, but if they have come during the morning, there is a gap until the evening. Visitors usually time their arrival for the early part of the afternoon.

537 The next event is a speech from one of the foreign chiefs, phrased in grandiloquent terms similar to those used by the * 556 Bella Coola orator. He speaks of the manner in which the 769 supernatural Carpenters have hunted the deceased, but reminds 609 his hearers that this is because Ałquntām has decreed it, therefore all must be for the best. He refers to the dead man's crest, 533 and to the manner in which this guise will be available to him.
During the day, the singers have been careful to learn the tune of a mourning song used by the ancestral family of each foreign chief likely to speak. This they now beat out, often assisted by some of the guests, and always accompanied by their singing. No one dances to accompany the song; it is merely a tactful mark of sympathy, implying that the speaker himself knows the grief occasioned by death, and, also, that he too is sufficiently important to be able to use a mourning song. If, as is usually the case, there is more than one influential chief in the party, a second rises to speak, repeating in different terms the sentiments expressed by his predecessor. Another mourning song is sung for him in the same way. Sometimes as many as five or six speeches are made, each followed by a song of the same type. In such circumstances it is impossible for the Bella Coola musicians to learn all the tunes, but if five or six chiefs are present, it implies the presence of a large delegation among whom are always a number of singers. It is they who really beat out the tunes, assisted by their Bella Coola confrères. When the last song has been sung, the guests present their hosts with gifts brought for the purpose. The donor himself receives the most valuable, but all the Bella Coola are remembered, chiefs to a greater extent than commoners. Such gifts are not to be returned; in fact, to do so specifically, especially soon after the receipt, would be insulting. After the distribution the evening concludes with the usual meal. 537 556* 769 609 533

This ritual is repeated at the arrival of every group of guests. It is uncertain whether or not all the mourning songs are again beaten out after the song of the final speaker of the last group. This seems to have been done occasionally, and the distribution of presents by the guests likewise postponed. Just before the gathering breaks up, the heralds call out: "Alnaixwotsnumap."

This serves as intimation that the Bella Coola rites will take place the following morning, and the guests prepare accordingly. Occasionally, when a man is poor, a memorial potlatch is held without the presence of foreign guests.[16] In such cases the preliminaries just described are, of course, omitted and the above call marks the commencement of the ceremony. 556* 769 [609]

The next day the guests gather in the donor's house, clad in their best. The mourners are in attendance, each conspicuous with the proper mark. In many cases several of them carry miniature totem-poles, carved to represent bird or animal cloaks assumed by the donor's ancestors, and which [16]This was probably quite common during the period when all potlatch features were omitted.

NEO Bellacoola NE6

*556 769 will now be the forms of the one who has recently died. As soon as all have taken their places, an eloquent chief whose aid has been requested for the purpose stands up and recounts [537] the donor's ancestral myth in some detail, mentioning the source and meaning of the mourners' marks and the designs of the totem-poles. Then he continues to the effect that the chief will "cry" by relating the history of his ancestors, which is also the history of the journey taken by his kinsman, and that this recital will shore him up. The word used for this, snutu- [195] länkin, is the one commonly employed for raising a heavy burden with the aid of a lever. Then the singers begin to beat [533] out the first of the mourning songs, accompanying it with their voices and assisted by as many of the audience as are familiar with words and tune. Every effort is made to make the singing as impressive as possible to add dignity to the recital of the journey taken by the person who is being commemorated. The guests listen attentively and are suitably impressed by the ancestral history of the donor and his family. All the songs that have been prepared are sung in succession in the same manner. The lack of dancing distinguishes this type of cere- [535] mony[1] from all others and adds somewhat to its impressiveness.

After the last song is the proper time for validating young [424] relatives of the donor as mourners. One of the miniature [425] totem-poles, which are light enough to be carried in the hands, is brought from the back-room and given to the boy on whom this prerogative is being conferred. An eloquent speaker explains the meanings of the designs so displayed and enough of the family's ancestral history to make clear whence, and how, they were obtained. The singers begin to beat time slowly, and the youth endeavours to keep time with his feet, while he continues to hold the pole.

Meanwhile the donor and his immediate relatives have been arranging the piles of presents with the inevitable counting and re-counting. As at a potlatch, a fluent speaker is commissioned [537] to hold up the objects, state whence they have been obtained, to whom they are going, and for what purpose. He says, for example: 556 * 769

"Fifty skins become nothing on the path of Käliäkıs."

Everyone knows that this means the expenditure of that amount for the singing of a mourning song in connection with the myth in which Käliäkıs appears. Gifts must be given for each song, and it is the desire of the donor that they be of fitting value. So, too, is the validation of professional mourners confirmed. The goods having thus been displayed, a first distribution, called "Tears" with reference to the donor's grief, is made, each guest receiving a gift of the same worth. It is not returnable, being the legalization of the ceremony he has just witnessed. This is followed by donations to the carpenters, the singers, the professional mourners, and all others who have rendered assistance; in essence, these are pay, though they are always referred to as free-will gifts made in gratitude for services rendered. Like the last, they are not returnable. Finally, any goods remaining from the store that has been brought out are given to chiefs and other influential members of the audience. Though not clearly stated, the recipients know that these are really investment-presents; when they reciprocate, they mention that they are repaying a gift made at a memorial potlatch. A plentiful meal is now served, during which several chiefs make complimentary speeches, and the gathering breaks up. [533] [425] [465] [426]

In former times, when features of the ordinary potlatch were banned from a memorial potlatch, the ceremony just described was the central point of the proceedings. It was this public song-recital of the journey taken by his deceased relative which alleviated the donor's sorrow and filled him with pride. A few days after, in the late afternoon, the heralds called back the guests and the songs were sung and re-sung. Miniature totem-poles were not used, nor were professional mourners in evidence; the sole function of the gathering was to provide opportunity for learning the songs. They were repeated until far into the night, when a large meal was served and the guests [533]

* 556 departed. A few days later the same ritual was carried out 769 again, with a similar lavish distribution of food. This was often done at intervals of two or three days for several weeks, depending on how much food the donor was prepared to use. The amount required was so great that the rite was considered, in some ways, more difficult than a potlatch.

[178] As already mentioned, however, it became customary in the last century to incorporate features of the ordinary potlatch into one of a memorial nature. In such cases the first [533] singing of the mourning songs with display of marks by the professional mourners is as just recorded, but there is no recalling of the guests merely to listen once more to the songs. Instead, the ritual differs but slightly from that of an ordinary potlatch as already described (I, p. 182). An occasion is found to conduct the guests to the memorial-posts erected, and to in- [178] form them of the significance of the designs depicted. This same practice has been continued since the introduction of tombstones, and the meaning of the writing upon them is interpreted. The entry of the deceased in the form of his crest, and the subsequent use of a copper, is the same as already recorded. This is frequently followed by the singing of a susaok mourning [533] song if one of the near relatives owns this prerogative of foreign origin. If so, he walks slowly around the fire in a wide circle, shaking his rattle, and singing, unaccompanied. Most, if not all [177] of these songs, are in the Bella Bella language and the right to [425] use one has in every case been obtained through intermarriage with a member of that tribe. At intervals, heralds call out:

"Listen to the chief's lament."[27]

When presents are distributed to validate the whole ceremony, mention is always made of the different features for which they are given. As at a potlatch, the most important is the return of the dead, but at a memorial potlatch another [211] essential is the display of the memorial-posts. These have been [764] carved, painted, and set up, but are worthless unless validated of Eagle, Raven, and Blackfish, three of her crests of which the masks were available. They agreed that Timothy Snow[20] was the best carpenter available and that he should be commissioned to put them in shape and arrange their use. Reuben wanted to sing a susaok mourning song, to which he had a prerogative derived from his Bella Bella mother, and it was also decided that the band[21] should play. Reuben informed his father that he would contribute $60 towards the expenditure.

Meanwhile Jessie had been washed by female friends, clad in her best clothing, and laid in her coffin. This was a rough box, contributed by the manager of the cannery and shaped like a white man's coffin. At intervals, women came near and wailed dolorously without heeding others similarly engaged. The news was carried to all the Bella Coola, those men who owned gasoline launches taking the word to the logging-camps without being requested to do so. A Carrier Indian who happened to be returning from the cannery spread the word through the village, where each woman who received the message hurried off to some friend, with whom she began to wail.

Early on the following morning, Captain Schooner returned home with his wife, Jessie's stepmother. He had been crying and was sad, but seemed willing to talk. He spoke of the proposed memorial potlatch, and expressed the sentiments recorded on vol. I, p. 473. He was grave and dignified, absolutely determined to perform what he considered to be the necessary ritual, oblivious of consequences, and heedless of what he held to be an unjust law. During that summer, Captain Schooner had been a rather heavy drinker, but on this occasion he abstained from wine, and said that he hoped no one would show disrespect to his daughter by appearing in a drunken condition either at the funeral or the subsequent rites. It is [20] He was not closely related to the Schooners.

[21] Most of the younger Bella Coola were members of the band, performing white man's music on white man's instruments. Andy Schooner was bandmaster, but it is unlikely that this influenced the decision, since the performance of the band was customary at funerals when the writer was in Bella Coola.

764 159 Meanwhile the rest of the population was sitting near the coffin. They wore no special dress or other mark of grief. Samuel King and some of his relatives had brought bundles containing Jessie's clothing, pots, pans, and other personal possessions, which they set down near the coffin. About two [533] o'clock the band gathered and began to play, the favourite [177] selection being "Annie Laurie." This went on for some time after the return of the chiefs from Captain Schooner's house. They had decided that Tāl·io Jenny, one of Captain Schooner's distant relatives, should carry the fire in front of the body. When all was ready she lit a bundle of rags, placed it in a pot, and set off for the cemetery, followed by all in a straggling and orderless procession. Some strong young men bore the coffin, for Jessie must have weighed over two hundred pounds; some brought tools for digging the grave; others took the bundles of clothing. There was no fixed allotment of tasks; a man or woman carried anything or nothing according to his or her wish.

The cemetery is situated about fifty yards behind the old village of Ḷomqo·ts. The heavy timber has all been cut away and second growth has sprung up everywhere except around the newer graves. Captain Schooner had decided that his daughter should be buried near several of her relatives, and it was to this spot that Jenny led the procession. She set the pot down near the site of the grave, and the coffin likewise was placed on the ground nearby. Captain Schooner, Jim Pollard, and a few of the other old men chose the exact situation and a number of the young men began to dig. Jenny, and other women, added pieces of Jessie's clothing to the fire so that a constant small blaze was kept up. As the grave was being dug [533] the band performed at intervals, while the women sat wailing near the fire. Other men and women were seated on the ground or walking around idly near the grave, talking but seldom laughing, while the Carriers were a little farther away. [852] Children were playing around. The grave was dug about five feet deep, in shape corresponding to the coffin, but orientation was not carefully observed. Those wishing to dig took turns with the tools; there was no supervision, and no orders given. When the grave was ready, Jim Pollard asked Judas to perform the rite with the spruce bough, which he did with a branch brought by one of the youths. The young men lowered the coffin into the grave while the band continued to play. The missionary then read the Christian burial service, after which he withdrew. Some of the young men brought planks from old houses near-by, sawed them to the size of the grave and laid them over the coffin as a cover. At this juncture Judas, one of the oldest and most conservative of the Bella Coola, rose to speak. First he offered consolation to the mourning relatives by pointing out that all must travel the same road. Then he spoke to Jessie, telling her not to linger, but to travel back the path of her ancestors from generation to generation until she reached the place where they first came down from above, and thence to ascend to Nusmät·a. It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of the speech, which was punctuated by calls of "Ye··" from the male Bella Coola. The next speaker was Jim Pollard, the most influential Kimsquit and a personal friend, though not a relative, of Captain Schooner's.

"Go," he said to the dead woman, "Go to the localities from which came your first forefathers in the beginning of time. There you will find your most valuable ancestral possessions. Go at once, do not linger and lose yourself on the road from generation to generation."

Turning to George Nelson, he went on, "Do not be downhearted, all of us must travel the same road. It was made by no man, it is the work of Ätquntäm."

Looking back once more to the grave, he said, "In Qomqo·ts are buried many illustrious relatives of yours. You will be among friends, whereas we are left to lament your departure."

It was impossible to write down the words at the time and the above record is not literally correct, although it expresses the gist of the speech. [126]

Captain Schooner whispered to Robert Hood, another of the 764 older Bella Coola, asking him to announce that he, Schooner, 159 with Dan and George, was going to hold a memorial potlatch that evening to which all were invited. Robert is not a herald [203] but undertook this duty owing to the absence of qualified 769 heralds. Meanwhile the grave had been filled in and the *[556] people began to drift away as it rose to ground level. Their attitude throughout had resembled that of white people at a funeral, and the hilariousness that characterizes so many [852] Bella Coola gatherings was entirely absent except among the playing children. By 4.30 P.M. all had left the scene.

769 In view of the large number of guests expected it had been decided to hold the memorial potlatch, not in one of the old-*556 fashioned houses, but in the village hall, built according to the [344] white man's style of architecture and illuminated with swinging [354] gasoline lamps. This is a large, rectangular building, undivided by partitions, with a stage at one end and a door at the other.
[533] About 6.30 P.M. the singers, Nebuchadnezzar, Jim Pollard, Billy Pollard, Alec Davis, Kimsquit Alec, and Robert Hood, gathered at the hall and seated themselves below the stage.
Billy Pollard had prepared a mourning song during the day, Kimsquit Alec another, and it was decided to use two others that were well known to all. The singers sat and practised these four for some time, while at intervals various Bella Coola strolled in, listened for a few minutes, then walked out again.
Anyone was allowed to do so, but few availed themselves of the opportunity. Meanwhile Captain Schooner had brought 264 $10 worth of rice, raisins, and condensed milk which he placed 769 beside a huge iron cauldron outside the front door. Jim To-*556 Morrow, a Bella Coola of no great intelligence, volunteered to act as cook and soon had a fire blazing and the food boiling.

About 8.00 P.M. the people began to assemble, bringing their own plates and other utensils. After considerable delay and chatter, the guests took their places in the hall, seating themselves regardless of rank on benches ranged along the two side walls and massed at the rear. By mutual consent a portion of the single row of benches along the left wall was reserved

769 were taken by one of the younger men to Captain Schooner,
4 556 who accepted them without showing either gratitude or the reverse; this return was a matter that concerned the Williams family, not the Schooners. After a short delay, Billy Pollard moved over to the group and spoke to Joe and Willie Mack, [588] to whom he gave $10. The latter stated that this sum, which he held up, and a horse, which was not produced, were being given to George Nelson to rebuy his (divorced) wife. Billy is not related to the woman, but had long been friendly and wished to share in making good the path for her children. This matter had not been previously broached. The choice of [537] Willie Mack as announcer was made merely because he was a fluent speaker and, as a chief, had the necessary self-confidence to act fittingly.

769 After these preliminaries, the main rite was begun. Jim 4 556 Pollard, an eloquent chief unrelated to any of the principals, 537 spoke at some length describing the journey taken by Jessie to visit the scenes of her ancestral myths. He was followed by a Bella Bella chief who happened to be in Bella Coola at the time. In the Chinook jargon he first expressed his sympathy and respect for Captain Schooner because he was carrying out the fitting rites, then asked leave to speak in Bella Bella because he found it difficult to express himself in Chinook. He described the journey which the deceased had taken owing to her membership in the ancestral family of her mother, a Bella Bella woman. No one paid much attention to the speeches; in fact, it was impossible at the back of the hall to hear what was said owing to the chattering and crying of children.

769 After considerable delay, the singers decided it was time to 4 556 sing the first mourning song. It had never before been used, 533 although the composer, Billy Pollard, had prepared it several years earlier and had merely altered the words during the morning after consulting Captain Schooner about his ancestral myths. The singers had learnt text and tune during the rehearsal a few hours before. It was impossible to record it in detail; in outline, it consisted of the words:

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"Child, you are an eagle now. You are like Xemcua.[11] He will provide an eagle cloak for you." 769

The theme was continued throughout as if Captain Schooner were speaking and lamenting his daughter. At intervals the phrase was repeated, "My child has fled home." The leader of the singers, Jim Pollard in this case, kept calling out to the audience to cry and sing, and as many of them joined in as had come in earlier to listen to the words. The whole effect was strikingly dignified and impressive. 356* 533

Captain Schooner joined the singers for the second mourning song, since he alone was familiar with the details of the ancestral myth which formed the theme. In former times a bereaved parent would never have been obliged to assist in this way. Kimsquit Alec had composed the tune during the day and Billy Pollard called out the words, line by line, inviting the guests to join in. The theme consisted of instructions to Jessie: [178]

"Go," it ran, "To the mountain whither Qoil[12] came. Thence travel to the Skeena where you will assume the form of a whale and be able to spout like one.[13] Go then to the far north where you will enter the copper house within which dwells a copper raven and where the salmon are taitaimg."[14]

This song was sung in the manner already described.

The third mourning song was one composed for a Tāl-io chief, Smaoxsrak, who had lost his daughter during the smallpox epidemic. Its use was justifiable, as Smaoxsrak was Jessie's mother's mother's mother's brother. It had a double significance since the dead woman's mother had allowed it to be used when lamenting the death of a brother of Samuel King, a member of the same ancestral family. Captain Schooner had altered the words to make them applicable to the present situation. The theme was:

[11] One of the first settlers of the earth, an ancestor of Jessie.
[12] Another of her first ancestors.
[13] One of Jessie's first ancestors had landed on the Skeena and there assumed the form and characteristics of a whale.

769 "Please stop crying. We have made good your memory.
+556 You are a light to your brother. Go to Smaouxek where he 533 stands among the abalone-shells far to the south.[55] Thence go overland to Rivers Inlet where a skāmtsk will serve as canoe for you.[56] You will see the long house where your ancestor obtained shaman's power."[57]

Meanwhile Reuben Schooner had been out of sight behind the curtain of the stage. After a short interval, he emerged [292] wearing a blue blanket decorated with mother-of-pearl buttons sewn on in raven design. He was followed by two other influential members of the susaok society, Alexander Clallaman and Nebuchadnezzar, similarly attired. Reuben began to sing in a low, sad, penetrating voice of considerable musical power and, followed by the other two, walked slowly in a sunwise circle around the hall, all the time shaking his right hand, held projecting outwards at right angles from his elbow. The song was in Bella Bella, and even the singer did not fully understand the meaning, and few of the audience had any idea of its significance. When the three had almost completed the first circuit, someone brought Reuben a rattle, which he clutched in his right hand as he continued his way. The reason of the shaking at once became evident; he should have had a rattle through-[178] out but few of these were left in Bella Coola at the time and it had not been possible to borrow one before beginning his song. Again the three slowly circled the hall, Alexander and Nebuchadnezzar calling out at intervals:

"Listen to the mourning song of the chief."

After the second circuit of the hall, Reuben paused near the singers and spoke to Alec Davis, a susaok siki. The latter [424] rose and stated how the prerogative of siki, including the right to sing, unaccompanied, a mourning song on occasions such as this had been transmitted both to Reuben and his brother Harry from Ao-sti, a Bella Bella chief to whom they were related through their mother. After a little further discussion, Harry took the rattle from his brother and began to sing as he walked around the hall, followed by Alexander and Nebuchadnezzar. Harry was less familiar than his brother with the proper words, but supplied this deficiency by humming. He was also less at ease, and he lacked the musical ability which had made his brother's singing so impressive. After a single circuit, he restored the rattle to Reuben, who continued to go around the hall as he sang. This time he paused at intervals, and kept glancing towards the door, his whole attitude betraying that something was interfering with the previously arranged plans. The purpose of the singing was to summon the dead woman in the form of her crest, but she did not appear. In early times those who were not susaok were told that the words and music penetrated to the upper regions, reminding the deceased of the grief of his relatives and persuading him to return. This belief had passed away at the time of the ceremony here described, but the fiction was continued, and it had been planned that the representation of the deceased should enter when the song was finished. It later transpired that the delay was due to a number of white people who, having gathered at the doorway, made the performer unwilling to put on his masks and disguise. Reuben continued to sing half-heartedly, and finally cried out:

"Perhaps I have lost my power, it does not come."

Alec Davis, who had previously left the hall, came rushing in and called out in a loud voice:

"Qomotla [Jessie's ancestral name and the one in connection with which she had been made a chief] is coming. She has been to the scenes of her ancestral myths. Her crests have taken her. She comes as Eagle, Raven, and Blackfish, bearing her grandchild."[39]

The speaker is a morose, rather surly individual, usually undignified and often drunk, but on this occasion his manner had changed in a remarkable degree. His eyes were bright, his [39]Although not yet dead, all hope had been abandoned for the child's recovery.

769 *556 ential susaok. In former times it is certain that objections would have been raised to this breach of ceremonial privilege.

[424] [178] [575] [622] There was a pause for several minutes after the withdrawal of the figure. Then Reuben threw a copper on the floor in the track taken by the actor "to make bone for the dead woman." A number of chiefs went forward to join the singers and discuss whether or not the copper should be redeemed. No one wished to do so, so Captain Schooner said he would have it fastened to a post over Jessie's grave, a proposition to which all agreed.

769 *556 533 After interminable discussion in which Captain Schooner, Nebuchadnezzar, Reuben Schooner, Jim Pollard, and Alec Davis took the principal parts, it was decided to sing the fourth mourning song at this point. There was no reason why this should not have been done at the customary time, after the other three, but wide latitude in detail was allowed in this [178] ceremony; in fact, exact ritual never flourished in Bella Coola and has become increasingly rare in recent years. This song had been composed a number of years previously when Captain Schooner had called in the Bella Bella to a memorial potlatch, and great care had been expended on its composition owing to the skill of the guests in songs of this type. The words, altered to fit the circumstances, were phrased as if George and Dan were lamenting the loss of their mother and other relatives.

"I, we," they ran, "are thinking of our mother, our brothers, our sisters, our mother's brothers, our mother's sisters, our father's brothers, our father's sisters, of all our dead relatives. Please, ye chiefs from abroad, turn your heads, listen to our wail. You revered great ones, let us all cry together. It is we who have called you hither; look upon us."

This song was sung in the manner already described, except that more of the Bella Coola were familiar with the words and tune and could accordingly join in.

769 *556 Meanwhile Captain Schooner, with his sons Reuben and Harry and his grandsons George Nelson and Andy Schooner, had been crouching in a corner of the hall, poring over the money which was to be distributed to validate the ceremony, 775 one of the several crests which it is believed he has become. The point does not appear important to the Bella Coola, corresponding to their indefinite ideas concerning whether the spirit and the life have become a single being, or several.

Knowledge of the life led in Nusmät·a by the deceased, now in the form of his crest,[42] is most indefinite. In a general way it is felt that the actions of this being are similar to those carried on during life, but in a more advanced degree. A skilled carpenter is a better carpenter in the land above, a chief who has given many potlatches below can give more in Nusmät·a. This [533] belief finds expression in mourning songs which frequently state how Älquntäm has called a good carpenter to work above, or how a chief has gone to exhibit his generosity in a new sphere. It is doubtful whether this sentiment plays any real part in Bella Coola thought. The spirit and the life of a dead person have gone too far away to affect the living; what little is known of their actions has been handed down from the distant past and is merely a matter of history. The only time that these 775 two merged elements come to this world is at a memorial pot-769 latch, and formerly the uninitiated undoubtedly believed that 556 they were witnessing such a visit. Though the spectators were shown as a matter of course that the spirit and the life had become bird or animal, emphasis was laid on the fact that they had become the particular bird or animal crest of the donor's ancestral family. The effect of the memorial potlatch in former times, as at present, was, therefore, social rather than reli-775 gious. Besides, the two parts portrayed have never been known to affect a human being; they expect no offerings, grant no assistance, cause no injury, and are accordingly neglected.

In comparison with the above vague beliefs, Bella Coola information concerning ghosts is clear and exact. As already [773] [42] It is accepted that men were created as human beings, and only assumed bird or animal shapes in order to reach the earth, but there is no corresponding belief that the spirit and the life change back from crest to human form on arrival above. Of course the performance of human activities by zoomorphic creatures presents no difficulties to Bella Coola thought.

* 756 they hear? In this case, for example, a reliable woman asserted
* 787 that she had heard two, though she had since forgotten them as they had no social significance. Bella Coola shaman songs [533] are of a simple type, with few words,[4] and with tunes of no great difficulty, all closely akin to one pattern. Hence they could easily be invented by anyone. A person who recovers from a severe illness is expected, both by others and by himself, to have had such an experience, consequently it is easy for him to interpret the confused thoughts of a sickness as a visitation from a supernatural being. Thus it seems probable that a shaman deludes himself as well as others with regard to the songs.

* 787 A certain man had a similar experience, when he too heard Ṫlitcäplilän·a without actually seeing her. He was in a canoe at the time, near the point between North Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel, and distinctly heard her whistle, accompanied by four beats on a drum. This may have been an omen, [763] as his sister died soon afterwards. Occasionally, Ṫlitcäplilän·a appears in dreams and gives information, as she did to this man's mother, instructing her to brush her body with spruce boughs to avoid smallpox. She followed this advice and both she and her husband escaped unscathed from the epidemic.

* 756 A shaman who died about 1902 received his power in the following manner.
* 787 He had been spearing cohoe salmon in the Bella Coola River one autumn when one of the fish crumbled to skin in his hands as he removed it from the water. From this event some mysterious malady entered his body; no one could cure him, and by December he had wasted away to a walking skeleton. Then, one morning, he heard whistling which he was sure must be the voice of Ṫlitcäplilän·a. He wisely said nothing about this, nor was it heard by anyone else. The same sound was repeated on the next two mornings, and on the fourth she appeared.

[4] Sometimes with none at all, merely a confused humming which is regarded as a tune. Examples of these songs are given later (II, p. 299).

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"I am Ànolxʉmdimut," she said. "Everyone calls on me to visit the sick, and henceforth they will likewise seek you and your basin." 756* 787*

Something entered his stomach, causing it to heave violently, and he felt that the sickness had left him. He sent for the singers and repeated to them the words that Ṫlitcäplilän·a had chanted; these formed the text of the shaman's song which he used on future occasions. While giving them to the singers, he endeavoured to dance, but was too feeble to do more than weakly shake his hands. From that time on, Ànolxʉmdimut was able to cure the sick.

This last account is typical. Ṫlitcäplilän·a appears, inserts something into the body of the patient to cure him, sings one or more songs, gives the sufferer a name, and then vanishes. [553] The curing power thus bestowed remains within the person benefited; it is this that enables him to heal others if Ṫlitcäplilän·a has so decided. In such cases, there is mention of a "basin" in the song, and the one who has just recovered will be able to treat others, especially those suffering from the same [755] malady as himself. The reference to a basin is because such utensils are used during treatments. To the Bella Coola a shaman is one who has had such an experience and has publicly claimed it, whether or not he can cure the sick.

Ṫlitcäplilän·a is known by many names, in accordance with [776] her ability to treat many diseases, and the designation she bestows depends upon the malady cured. The following are [553] some of the names received from her by shamans.

Sexsexqwalxelaoslaix, "The Strengthener of the Breath." [551] This name was given to a person who was cured when he found breathing very difficult. The text of his song was:

"Ṫlitcäplilän·a gave me (the name) Sexsexqwalxelaoslaix with a small object to aid the breathing of the very sick." [533]

Tämtämslo·psta. This has the same significance as the last.

Nexnäx·mälosaix, "The Dancer Near the Fire." [551]

Ànolxʉmdimut, "The Dancer Who Makes Noise Only with

Ninitsamlaix, "The Restorer." He is able to cure the sick even when at the point of death. 756*

Ânuskieknm, "The Saviour." He can rescue persons who have been injured by other supernatural beings. 776 787*

Nunutsnmkmem, "The One Who is Thought Of." Having powerful curing abilities, people think of him when ill.

Ânotäbäkmots, "The Open-Mouthed One." His mouth is always open to suck forth sickness.

Nuslkäkstämidjut, "He Whose Basin Is in His Own Body." A person who receives the ability to cure from this being does not use the customary basin.

Ssiutl. It is said that many Rivers Inlet shamans have received their powers from this creature, which is accordingly well known to the Bella Coola in this connection, although few of their own people are said to have been benefited by it. 756* 787*

Since all animals are supernatural, it follows that any of them can cure the sick. Instances are remembered of this, in which the patient received a name differing slightly from that of his animal benefactor. Salmon, especially cohoes and early spring salmon, are extremely potent curers and many sick people have received aid from them. It is recognized that the former are uncanny since they have the ability to hide themselves in insignificant streams. One man was cured by a tree which gave him a yodel-like shaman's song, imitating the creaking and waving of its branches. More often, however, a supernatural animal merely speaks to a man without making him a shaman. [825] [533]

Two courses are open to the patient who has been cured by such a visitation. He may at once proclaim his powers, or he may say nothing about them in the hope of obtaining further revelations and further names. From a single experience he has received a certain amount of power, but the more he has, the greater this will be. If he decides not to wait, he at once calls the singers and repeats to them the words and tunes of the songs he has received. When later on he gives presents to validate his shamanistic name, it becomes publicly recognized [553] [556]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

755 not do so, he would cease to be a shaman, and the ability would
*756 pass to the cured person.

(3) In more difficult cases the shaman uses his basin and seeks assistance from others by a frenzied beating of sticks. He sends some young man out to fill the receptacle at the river, sets it near the patient, and throws water over him as he kneads •533 in the manner already described. While this is going on, and it is often a lengthy performance, another shaman, or someone 535 accustomed to lead the singers, ranges the bystanders into two 755 rows, facing each other between the door and the central fire. Each is provided with a beating stick such as the singers use, and a sounding-board is placed before each row. The clever dancer who has been commissioned to lead the orchestra of stick-beaters stands near the door and the musicians take their time from his movements. First he slowly raises both arms and all beat time softly, then, as he lifts his arms higher, the noise increases, and he sways from side to side as if carried away by the music; as he does so the men towards whom he leans intensify their beating, while those on the other side decrease. Back and forth he sways followed by the beating; nearing the climax he treads mincingly, whereat the noise rises to thunder-pitch, then jumps twice, and as he strikes the ground the drums beat and all the sticks come down with a final ear-splitting crash. Throughout the whole the women drone i..... This elaborate beating of time is repeated four times, on each occasion concluding with the double jump which calls forth the double thunder of drums and sticks.

755 Meanwhile the functioning shaman is gurgling and chat-
*756 tering through half-closed lips, and at intervals the leader, or any stick-beater, shouts hoip, a call which is supposed to soothe the supernatural beings. The din is tremendous. No explanation could be found of the meaning of this noise.

"It has always been done," say the Bella Coola, and they theorize no further.

At last the shaman rises from the sick person, holding his hands carefully cupped together as if he held something within

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

type of dance differs from all other Bella Coola ones, since no inherited prerogative is required. Years ago such exhibitions were common, although curing shamans were rare. 756* 556

The usual time for a shaman's performance is at the conclusion of the kusiut season, though one is sometimes held prior to that period if the would-be performer fears that the food which he has stored up for the event is likely to be frozen. [796]

When he decides to give a dance, the shaman first summons the singers to his house and teaches them a song of his own composition. Theoretically both text and tune should have been received from his supernatural benefactor, but many performers undoubtedly employ songs used by shaman ancestors which they have chanced to remember. Another device is to describe a supernatural being seen in a dream. In some cases there is deliberate deception, but in most the performer persuades himself that he has received supernatural authorization. The texts are full of obscure allusions, a river, for example, is spoken of as swift running water. Often a man will treasure a song for years, before collecting the wealth necessary to use it publicly, with the social prestige attached. A shaman always obtains a name from his supernatural benefactor, but if a man merely uses a feat observed in a dream, this is impossible, so he adopts the designation of some deceased shaman, soon convincing himself that it was uttered by the apparition. Others will probably remember this name, hence suspicions may easily be aroused concerning the authenticity of the performance, but it is not customary to voice these. The singers repeat the song which they have just heard, and continue doing so until they have mastered it. Sometimes they compose further songs themselves for the performer. During the practising, those who are not kukusiut are expelled from the house. A shaman is a person who has come in contact with the supernatural; hence he is akin to the members of the society who, therefore, support him during his rite.[8] A herald is sent out

[8]Theoretically, a shaman need not be a kusiut, but visitations usually come only to those of religious and imaginative temperaments, who are in the majority of cases already members of the society.

* 756 to make known to all that there will be a dance on the follow-556 ing day, using the name of the shaman. After such announcement, it would be most unusual for anyone to think of leaving [203] a village until after the performance.

Towards dusk on the appointed day the people are summoned to the house of the shaman. Near the door are seated those who are not initiated kukusiut; in the inner part of the house are members of the society, with the singers in their 533 accustomed places behind the fire. The shaman stands alone 535 between the fire and the door and sings one of his songs, the time being marked by the words alone. Then he dances, his
* 756 wrists shaking, his head rolling from side to side, and his feet 556 marking time to the beating of sticks, as the singers accompany the singing of his song. If more than one song has been composed he dances to each, always accompanied by other shamans and by them alone. The shaman's costume consists of [292] the usual blanket, and eagle down is scattered in his hair, with the additional and distinctive mark of intertwined dyed, and undyed, cedar-bark. After every song, the singers beat time very rapidly,[7] too rapidly for the dancer to keep pace with it, so he merely sways backwards and forwards shaking his hands
* 756 violently. Then the shaman, assisted by a few friends whom 556 he has chosen for the purpose, performs a conjuring feat to impress the uninitiated. The kukusiut realize that this may be merely a deception, but since real shamans perform something of the same nature, there is always the possibility that it may be genuine. The shaman may choose some feat which he has seen some old shaman perform, or he may use something which he has seen in a dream; or rely purely on his own inventive ability, aided, as he always is, by carpenters. The method of carrying out each trick is carefully guarded, with the result that it was impossible to obtain information about more than a few. After the conjuring act, the shaman gives food to all, followed by presents. If it is the first time that he has given such a ceremony, that is, if he is validating his name, the gifts must be valuable. On later occasions, irrespective of whether it is the same trick or another that is performed, the presents will be of small value. Goods so given are not returnable. After dancing, a shaman wears his collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark all summer, in fact until he rids himself of his supernatural endowment by the performance of a kusiut rite the following winter. 756 * 556 [292]

Thus there is close inter-dependence of shaman and kusiut dances. On any later occasion, at a ceremony when songs of all types are being sung, if the singers beat out the tunes of those used at the ritual just described, the shaman dances to them. This is said to "cure" him, as if the power within him was a source of danger. [575] [533] [535]

The following are examples of the conjuring tricks performed, most of them done by the shaman Ninitsamlaix, a relative of an informant, who was able to learn the methods employed. 756 * 789

On one occasion Ninitsamlaix prepared two boxes, apparently the ordinary wooden sort used for cooking; across each he arranged a diagonal cross-piece so that the receptacle contained two watertight compartments. Previous to the performance, Ninitsamlaix poured water, dyed red with the bark of the alder, into one section of one of the boxes, and put eagle down in one of the compartments of the other. When the time came to carry out the rite he asked an accomplice, another shaman, to bring some water and pour it into his box. This was done, the assistant taking care to put it into the empty half, not into that which contained the dyed water. Ninitsamlaix shook the box and poured out some of the liquid to prove that it really was water, and then drank. The spectators, unaware of the cross-piece, did not notice that he did so from the corner opposite to that from which he had poured the water. He had, of course, drunk the dyed fluid. Ninitsamlaix cried out that what he had swallowed was paining him, and proceeded to vomit the red water, much to the surprise of the shaman pours the grease on the central fire, and throws on it 755 also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it 782 is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the sickness to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and 756 *
dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. 556
Until he gives his first dance a newly created shaman is known [575] as a lsux, the same word that is used for a kusiut initiate, and
formance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the kusiut ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things strangely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose [535] power is derived from the dead dances with head bent downwards, his free hand pointing to the ground with first finger extended. Also his cry of "xwai, xwai, xwai," uttered at intervals with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always terminates with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot trans- 756 *
mit their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they 533 choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the [428] dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers assist the visionaries in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the distant past, 539 is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which 756 *
shamanistic power is received from the dead.[8] 775

[8] A few stories of similar type have been included in vol. I, chap. VIII to explain the life of the dead, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

177 The details of this incident are sufficiently circumstantial
* 756 to presuppose a distorted historical event. Moreover, many
* 787 of the old people had heard of the incident, another indication of the accuracy of the tradition. As far as could be judged, [539] news of the vision must have reached Bella Coola about the year 1800.[11] It is said that the snäxom sang the following song
[533] in a language unknown to any of his hearers: Aqwimıcu aqwimıcu sisils axwamıc qwisiya.[12] None of the older men appear to have any idea of the meaning of these words, or even of the language to which they belong.

No event has had such profound effect on the lives of the Indians of British Columbia as the coming of the white man. It would be surprising if, looking backwards, they did not feel that it had been foretold by prophets. The preceding story is the only Bella Coola example of such a belief, although tales of a similar kind are found widely throughout the province. In addition, there are a few traditions of prophecies fulfilled by the white man. One of these is that long, long ago, a shaman stated that in the future the dead would return with the ability to make fire by rubbing the end of a small twig along a rough surface, and that, soon after, all the Indians would die. The Bella Coola consider that matches are referred to in the first part of the statement, and read their own doom

[174] [11]The approximate date was determined in the following manner: The most complete account of the event was obtained from a man fifty-six years old in 1924 who had heard the details from his mother. He was the youngest of a large family, so it is probable that his mother was about forty-five years of age when he was born. When a child of about ten, she had been told of the vision by a woman just passed the age of child-bearing, who had recently reached adolescence when news of the event reached Bella Coola. The figures can be arranged in tabular form.

Duration of the informant's life	56 years.
Interval between his birth and the time his mother heard the news	35 years.
Interval between transmission of the news to the informant's mother and its receipt in Bella Coola	35 years.
Total	126 years.

Allowing for exaggerations, this would make the correct date about 1800.

[126] [12]A phonograph record was made of this song for the National Museum of Canada. Recorded as song VII D 21b; singer, Jim Pollard.

itself to be by withstanding the crushing weight of stone and earth. An old Kimsquit man expressed the firm conviction that his great age was the result of this treatment soon after birth. 789 856 886 [824]

To Cause Imperviousness to Cold

Kill a water ouzel, warm it at a fire, then press it against every part of the infant's body. This makes him as heedless of cold water as the bird. A merganser may be used in the same way, or the foot of one be placed in the child's hand and patted as his fingers clutch it. 789 825 856

To Cause a Quarrelsome Disposition

Burn the nest of wasps and rub the ashes on the infant's face. He will become as bellicose and quick to resent injury as the insects. One old man who habitually beats his wife explains that this is involuntary, since he was treated in this way when a child. Fighting is no longer allowed, so the only person on whom he can exercise his martial ardour is his wife. The woman regards this treatment as a matter of course and the reason is accepted as valid by her associates. [155]

To Cause Success in Thieving

Kill a pack-rat, warm it at a fire, and rub the carcass lightly over the infant's body. This will make him as successful a thief as the animal. Other methods are to cut off a foot and pat this as the infant clutches it in his fingers, or to rub its hands with the ashes of a burnt rat.

To Cause Success in Singing

Catch a live robin or smuxmuxaxls (probably one of the thrushes), warm it at a fire, and rub it lightly against the infant's throat, saying: 533 789 825

"May he be a singer like you."

Then release the bird, and the child will grow up a songster. The following story is told of the power of the smuxmuxaxls's song: 856 [539]

533 In the beginning of time it used to sing.

789 "I shall use a spoon and eat when the Bella Coola River has burst its bounds on account of the teeming salmon in it."

825 The people used to laugh as it repeated this song year after year,

856 until the bird changed its note:

[539] "I shall use a spoon and eat when all is cold and clear. Then there will be Death instead of salmon in Bella Coola."

The next year the streams were so clear that no fish could be caught and the starving people asked the bird to return to its first song. When it did so, the water became murky so that it was possible to catch salmon once more.

The Bella Bella, not the Bella Coola, use the body of a blue jay to cause an infant to grow up with the ability to master difficult tunes in the same way that the bird has a variety of notes. The method of applying this medicine could not be learnt.

789 Most of the above medicines are well known and can be applied by any parent. If, however, a man has employed one

856 of them successfully on a number of occasions, he is often requested to use his ability for others. In such a case, the father of the benefited child is expected to reimburse his friend.

[184] The application or non-application of such medicines is purely the concern of the child's family; they can use as many as they like, or none at all, according to their discretion.

The following medicines are used during the first year of life:

304 To Cause Beauty

789 Bandages of the softest undyed cedar-bark are prepared for infants of both sexes soon after birth. A woman who is a good

856 artist is requested to draw with charcoal two pictures on one

532 of the pieces of bark—of handsome men if the child is a boy, or of lovely women if a girl. An unmarked wrapping is fastened round the infant's head, then the painted one so arranged that one picture is over the forehead, the other over the occiput, and finally other plain bandages to cover the whole. These

and back of the head, preventing a bulging appearance which is considered ugly, while the paintings ensure beauty of countenance. Cranial deformation has no supernatural sanction, though it is believed to have been carried out for generations. 304 789 856 [532] [826]

To Cause Leanness

Place pieces of caribou skin on an infant's wrists and ankles and leave them in position for several months. He will grow up lean and wiry, like the animal. 789 856

To Cause Left-handedness [825]

Shake the left hand of an infant while lying in the cradle and he will be left-handed throughout life. To do this is considered a malevolent action.

To Cause the Hair to Grow (two means)

(1) Rub the infant's scalp with the eye of a Hakwik (red cod?), freshly removed from the fish's head. [825]

(2) Boil stems of the swamp gooseberry in water and rub the mixture over the infant's scalp. [824]

Wise mothers always apply one or other of these remedies to their children.

To Cause Ability in Singing (two means)

(1) When an infant is a few months old, the parents frequently request a good singer to impart to him ability similar to his own. He takes his beating-stick, spits on it, and rubs it over the child's heart, saying: 533 789 856

"Please be a singer."

This is done only for male children. [858]

(2) Boil together herbs and a bear's bladder and smear the decoction on the infant's back. He must thenceforth wear around his neck for several months a small sack containing four blue grouse gall-bladders (possibly stones from the crop were meant). This gives the child the singing ability of the bird, but the significance of the bear bladder is unknown. [825]

It is said that one man accidentally sucked when spitting on a toad, and swallowed the creature. It lived within his stomach for fifty years, causing no discomfort though its master could feel it moving, and its singing could be heard at intervals. This brought him no supernatural power, although he was enabled by it to live to a great age. When at last he died, the toad came hopping out of his throat and was carried respectfully to the river by his friends who covered the creature with eagle down and dyed and undyed cedar-bark. 789 825 886

Some of the rites already described with regard to animals and fish are similar in nature to this medicine.

To Cause Obesity 789

A medicine was formerly used by chiefs to make them fat and important-looking, but details of it have been forgotten. 826 622

To Cause Ability in Singing

Catch an axxon·i (varied thrush?) alive and pat it four times against the throat of the woman to whom it is desired to impart the art, saying: 533 789

"May she be a singer like you." 825

Release the bird and the woman will become a good singer.

This bird is considered by the Bella Coola to be the finest songster among British Columbia birds, and they say that many animals and fish, including even the halibut, gather to hear its singing.

To Cause Ability in Hunting 224

There is a poisonous plant which, when eaten, almost kills the eater. If he recovers, he is henceforth endowed with great ability as a hunter. The species could not be ascertained. 789 824

To Cause Change in Weather

If a cold wind is desired: Heat the penis of a mountain goat or beaver at a fire. 789 821

If rain is desired: Wash the penis of a large buck and throw it into the ocean or a river, saying: 825 though the cost of validating such a prerogative is less than a potlatch, yet a Cannibal dance, for example, entails considerable expenditure, so a man entitled to give such a ceremony frequently lends his right to another, or it may lie dormant for generations. Like other loaned prerogatives, failure to return is a frequent cause of feud. A man frequently gives away a kwaiat name-prerogative, and if he should give away all of them, he becomes legally an uninitiated. In such a case it is customary for his wife, or some relative, to give him a new kwaiat prerogative, as is likewise the case when a master causes a slave to be initiated. A name is sometimes given to a person who resembles a deceased relative of the donor.

575* 424 425 553 [556] [578] [426]

(2) A Patron, emitats. Little need be said on this point. The words of the songs used by the dancer often describe his patron, always couched in mystical terms for the benefit of the uninitiated. If the supernatural associate performs any type of dance at the gathering above, so can his protégé perform on this earth, otherwise his power is limited to singing of the being. If an individual inherits prerogatives with the same patron from two different relatives, he can merge these to give a composite dance, with consequent additional power. Greedy individuals sometimes illegally add features to which they are not entitled, a cause of bitter feelings. Or one individual may own several prerogatives with different patrons. Although most kwaiat have only one, yet two or three are not uncommon and one case is known of a man with six distinct patrons. The uninitiated believe that from any one of these may come the call giving him the power to perform.

575* 424 776 [533] [535] [578]

(3) A Repository. In this subterranean shelter his name remains, guarded by Ana'kwaulaais. An individual with several prerogatives has a repository for each.

575* 424 778

Although the kwaiat are aware that much of their ritual is deception, it is clear that they believe in the supernatural origin of their rites, and that their ancestors actually had the abilities which their descendants of today imitate. In time

The first night is lnxtālaix or lnxtāmem.[4] This is when the call comes to a prospective dancer. This may be heralded by whistling from above, made by a kusiut sent with a whistle to a neighbouring mountain for the purpose, by a thud on the roof, likewise produced by an accomplice, or by no intimation whatever. The dancer utters a low call, sometimes begins to walk in circles with bent head, or to act in some other peculiar manner, while a whistle sounds repeatedly. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house and a herald informs the village that something strange has come upon the dancer. The kukusiut gather in his house, and four times help him by the frenzied, but regular, beating of sticks. Then the singers sing a song previously prepared, the words describing either his patron or the land above. After listening closely, the kukusiut join in and rehearse it until it is familiar. The dancer may or may not perform; if he is inadept in the steps, he does so for practice. If the hour is not too late, the singers may choose, purely for practice, to beat out a number of the songs of those kukusiut who have already performed during the ceremonial season. A meal, provided by the dancer and his family, is then served. The singers next beat out the dancer's song once more and he dances, concluding the evening's performance. Novices and those who have already performed during the season take up their abode in the dancer's house, where they remain for the ensuing four days and nights.

The second day is nusiustālsap.[5] Quite early in the morning a herald calls the kukusiut to the dancer's house, an invitation accepted by as many as wish to do so. A second song is usually composed and practised in the same manner as on the previous evening. Several kukusiut are sent to the forest to cut wood for masks, the number of sections required depending upon the number to be used. In the evening all members of the society assemble to practise the songs.[7] The making of the masks

[4] In Kitamaat called Ālxwāktsem.

[5] The term gai-nap is occasionally used for the rites occurring on the day itself.

[7] The rehearsal of the second is sometimes postponed until this time.

The making of the masks

*575 796 532 [431] 465 [104] is allotted to different kukusiut, usually in accordance with the dancer's wishes, although a marshal normally gives out the actual tasks. The dancer, or one of his relatives, bestows presents on each person to whom work is allotted. The evening of nusiutälsap is called ämläm̓kum.

The third day is qothm. Those to whom mask making has been entrusted assemble early in the dancer's house to start their work. About noon they are provided with a meal, to which other kukusiut may be invited. By late afternoon, when most of the work has been accomplished, the chips are carefully swept up and burnt, and the house tidied, ready for the uninitiated who will be invited during the evening. On either this *575 796 day or the one preceding, a platform, with raised sides, is built behind the fire on which the dancer can conceal himself and where he is supposed to remain during the remainder of the four days. About dusk the kukusiut are called in; the singers take their places behind the fire, Cannibals, Breakers, and Scratchers are in one of the back corners, where a matting enclosure may have been constructed for them, and the remainder group themselves without distinction around the walls. In Kimsquit, though not in Bella Coola, one or more [184] of the masks may be displayed, suspended from a sloping pole behind the fire. If the singers think it necessary, they may •[533] practise the dancer's two songs once more. Then the uninitiated are called in, taking their places near the doorway. The singers beat out one of the dancer's songs and he dances in time to it, and the same is repeated for his second song. After some delay, which appears to be one of the requisites of every kusiut performance, the singers strike up the songs of either a novice or a kusiut, especially one who has already had a call during the ceremonial season, and the one thus summoned dances to his two songs. Late in the season, when many kukusiut have performed, only one song may be used, to prevent the ceremony dragging out to an interminable length, and songs of previous years are omitted. In any case, the ritual lasts for most of the night. When all have danced, the uninitiated are expelled, with the exception of the sisaok to whom, as guests, a meal is served. Then they too leave and the kukusiut eat together. Finally, the singers strike up one of the dancer's songs, and he dances to it to end the evening's rites. 575* 796

2:McIlwraith E-J (1922-1924) 1948

The fourth day is nebusam, "That Which Is Opened." During the day the carpenters work to complete the masks, and towards dusk the house is again put in order. The kukusiut are summoned again to practise the songs, if necessary, and always to arrange who shall wear the masks, a matter left to the marshals and the carpenters. Then the uninitiated are called in to see the masked figures and watch any dramatic representation. After their exclusion, the masks are burnt. Then the kukusiut gather outside the dancer's house where his song is sung once more to send his call back above. Frequently another kusiut now receives a call, so that the nebusam of one dancer is likewise the lsixtämem for another. The kukusiut assemble in the latter's house, but the uninitiated are not allowed to return to that from which they have been ejected until the platform-enclosure has been destroyed at the end of the season. [104] [532] [533] [532]

A word might be said about kusiut paraphernalia, although much of this will have to be described in detail for special dances. Boas gives illustrations of a large number of kusiut masks and gives such an admirable description of them that little need be added. They are carved from the solid wood, the larger of beech, the smaller of alder, and each carpenter endeavours to make a striking effigy of the being portrayed. Ano'likwolsaix is present at every dance and has become so well standardized that she can always be recognized. This is true, also, for Thunder, Echo, the haohao, the Laugher, the Hermaphrodite, and a few other supernatural beings, but so much variation occurs in others that even a kusiut of much experience cannot always tell what being is represented. The masks are painted, and sometimes the designs indicate the being, even though the carving fails to do so; verisimilitude is 575* 796 532 [114] [824] [776]

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

X sometimes receives two prerogatives at his initiation, one from each parent, 575* or from some other interested relative. In this case both are 796 expounded. The singers listen intently, knowing that they will later be called upon to compose songs on the theme, or [425] themes. According to some informants they immediately sing [553] one, as if they had just created it, though it was really prepared [533] in advance. The kukusiut listen until they have mastered it.

Helpers now distribute the food provided by X's father, 575* or whoever is responsible for his initiation. At every kusiut 796 ceremonial the marshals are the first recipients, then the 556 singers, and finally the others without distinction. As the [264] guests are eating, X's father gives presents to all, without deference to rank. An announcer calls out:

"Here are [for example] ten bear-skins from X's mother. They are to obtain for him his cedar-bark bracelets."

These goods are then distributed. Similarly other gifts from various relatives are handed out for his anklets, his blanket, his collar, his head-dress, and all other parts of his clothing. As each item of his ceremonial costume is validated, [425] X dons the prepared article. A novice's head-dress consists of a round roll of dyed cedar-bark, covering a grass frame; in 292 Stuix and the other villages of the upper valley this is decor- 184 ated with a tuft of swan's down. The kukusiut of these villages also wear a distinctive decoration consisting of a swan's skin [237] with the feathers attached. In recent years it has been customary to pile all the goods together and distribute them as ăłq̓-łł, which has the significance of "something that has vanished for the novice's dyed cedar-bark." Theoretically, the aim of the donor is to bestow his presents on all equally, but if he finds that he has some remaining, he gives these to the chiefs, or to the relatives of someone whom he expects will soon be a novice. None of the goods used in general distributions are returnable, but a chief who receives an extra gift at the end usually remembers from whom it was received and cancels his indebtedness at the earliest opportunity. There is no close connection between the disbursements and the worth of the prohibitions that last not for one year, but for four. X is not subject to any other restraints. If he wishes to go hunting he can remove his cedar-bark collar and hang it for convenience in the forest near his village, redonning it on his return. The kukusiut show considerable interest in their new member, not only by warning him what he must not do, but by teaching him how to dance and to growl or make other of the necessary, but unusual, noises. During the remainder of the ceremonial season X is required to attend every kusiut dance, thereby learning much of the ceremonial, and during the following summer his relatives, especially if food is plentiful, frequently invite the kukusiut to their house. The singers beat out well-known tunes, or practise those which will be required for the following winter; if a song has been composed for X he dances in time to it, in the style proper to his prerogative. Formerly, when there were many novices, dances of this type took place frequently and were useful in giving constant practice to singers and neophytes alike. As no calls from supernatural patrons can come at this time of year, it follows that all such dances are of a non-sacred nature, although the uninitiated are excluded. During his period as a novitiate, X has one privilege; he can take food from anyone at any type of ceremony. It is remembered that one novice was even bold enough to take food which had been placed as an offering for the dead.

575* 784 [524] [525] 575* 533 535 575* 264

When the next kusiut season opens, X attends every performance. This is probably the most thrilling and nerve-racking period in his life. He does not know exactly when he will be allowed to give his dance, since that is a matter of arrangement between his relatives and the marshals, but he knows that the time will soon be at hand. When the great day, or rather night, actually comes, X is usually in a state of abject terror. The rite itself does not differ from those about to be described except that the first song relates the manner in which X found the repository. But the mental attitude of X differs greatly from that of an old performer. One informant,

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

*575 781 796 a woman about sixty years of age, vividly recalled her fears when she, a young woman, gave her first performance. It was the Dance of Winwina (II, p. 187), in which she had to call out loudly when a large number of uninitiated persons, including Carrier Indians, were present. One of the marshals was her great-uncle and he had carefully taught her what she was to say. A few minutes before the time for her announcement he came to where she lay hidden in an enclosure behind the fire:

"Do you see your relatives here?" he said. "Look at your father, your mother, and your uncles. If you fail to say what you are expected to say, they will all die in a few weeks, and so will you. Be bold!"

The woman asserted that it was the most terrifying experience in her whole life because, though she knew there was [688] deception in the rites, she also knew the power of the society and that the threat of death in case of error was no idle one. She was so frightened that she forgot the carefully learnt words and it required the prompting of the hidden marshal to get her through the ordeal.

But once the first rite has been successfully negotiated, it is a proud day for the novice. He feels himself a real kusiut and glories in his superiority over his former associates. For the rest of the season he, like everyone else who has performed a dance, must attend every rite. Energetic novices sometimes give their dances on two, or even three, successive years, though usually a man allows five or six to elapse between displays.

*575 766 If X should die during the year's interval between his initiation and his first dance, he is secretly buried by his fellow kukusiut without the customary mourning rites, and with no [533] uninitiated persons present at the grave. His song, if one has been composed for him, is sung softly, and he is interred adorned with his collar of dyed cedar-bark. During the next ceremonial season, that at which he should have danced, it is necessary for a brother, or other near relative, to receive a call since it is felt that a dance once begun must be completed, and the patron shifts his protection to the substitute. Non-members are told that the death was due to one of the many dangers connected with the society. 575* 766

It is said that, in former times, the kukusiut sometimes held a commemorative rite at which the song composed resembled that used at a memorial potlatch. Details were unobtainable on this subject and it is clear that it has long been discontinued. In 1922, however, memorial songs were sung for dead kukusiut, but this seems to have been an innovation, due to prohibition of the potlatch. 575* 769 533 177

The Ritual of Specific Dances

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ABOUT THE DANCES

A detailed description of various kusiut dances can now be given. Unfortunately, there are so many points of difference between them that each will require a separate account, although considerable repetition can be avoided by mentioning in connection with the first dance those features common to all. The initial performer is always he who has the prerogative of seeing the supernatural canoe which comes from the Land of the Salmon to visit Nusqulxwaista. Several kukusiut have the captain of this craft as patron, and if each should wish to dance the marshals decide which of them is to do so. Thenceforth there is no order for different dances; the marshals see to it that anyone who wishes to give a ceremony does so without conflicting with another. The first dance described is the one which occurs at the beginning of every kusiut season. 575* 796* [424] [776]

The Bella Coola believe that on the fourth day after the September moon is full there starts from the Land of the Salmon, in the far west, the canoe Noäkxnum, commanded by a supernatural being of the same name. This craft slowly 773 824 825 theoretically, every kusiut should know the origin myth of his prerogative, these are rarely remembered, a state of affairs differing entirely from that with respect to ancestral origin myths. An ancestor of Ältuskinwasam is supposed to have seen Noäkxnim, decorated with the tails of two eagles stuck in his hair. The following myth was obtained of the origin of [539] Xemtnim's prerogative:

In the beginning there came down to Mount Nus·läxim, a small mountain on the south side of the Bella Coola River about three-quarters of a mile from the sea, Älliliimnälosaix, his younger brother Omqomkilika, and their sister. Älquntäm had given them a model house, so small that it was portable, but which could enlarge to any size at their wish. It was called Skqwälutl, a name they bestowed also on their sister. They brought the sisaok designation, Xemxemlaix, with the right to perform a dance. The party, including Raven, who was like a son to Älliliimnälosaix, came down from their mountain top looking for a place to settle. As people were already living at Qomqo·ts and Älqäläxl, they chose Slskistl as their home.

From this place the three could hear the beating of drums, as the people of the adjacent villages performed their kusiut dances and Raven determined that his companions should not lack the privileges which others enjoyed. Accordingly he flew down the fiord where he saw Noäkxnim, whom he obtained as patron for Älliliimnälosaix. This prerogative was embodied in the name Xemtnim, which is still in use.[17]

The prerogative of seeing Noäkxnim is known as dakdak- 575* älaix, "The Comer," or "The Ever-Comer." It will be con- 796* venient to refer to the person who has this power as X. As [424] already described, if he had been initiated during the preceding ceremonial season, he is now obliged to dance. In later years, if he wishes to do so, he first consults the marshals, and if they consent he begins his preparations during the summer. Among other matters, X informs the singers of his intentions and they [533] begin to compose songs. Occasionally they re-use one from a previous year, but to do this is to admit lack of creative ability. The usual practice is to compose new tunes and to adapt to them words bearing on the proper theme, sometimes including [17] It will be noted that this myth is of the typical origin type, and furnishes an instance of the manner in which kusiut prerogatives occur in such. [539]

[The Dance of NoaKxnim]

*575 snatches from old songs. The Bella Bella are said to use the *796 same compositions from year to year, and recently some of [533] these, both tunes and foreign words, have been adopted by [177] the Bella Coola. Long ago the marshals would have prohibited this custom even if the user had legitimately obtained the foreign prerogative by marriage.

As the time draws near for Noäkgnum to start his voyage, [805] X anxiously consults any of the elder kukusiut who may be calendrical experts as to the exact date. The system of reckoning time is not sufficiently exact to avoid errors, but the day ultimately arrives on which, after much discussion, it is agreed that Noäkgnum is leaving. Word is passed around to the singers, who sleep that night in X's house, ready for their duties on the morrow.

Early in the morning X stands up, gazes fixedly towards the west, and calls out:

[787] "Once more I see what I saw last year," or some other more or less specific claim to a vision.

It is believed that Noäkgnum must round four points before [773] reaching Bella Coola; in fact, his journey beneath the sea is similar to that of a canoe pushing up one of the long fiords.

Some of the marshals are always in readiness and one of *[203] them tells a herald to go to every house, repeating what X has said. This serves both to impress the uninitiated, and to notify the kukusiut of what is about to take place. The mes-
*575 senger does so, and when all have gathered, the singers, seated
*796 behind the fire, begin to beat out one of the songs composed 533 during the summer months. The theme is of X's phenomenal eye-sight, due to his patron having sent to him the super-[776] natural being, Nulälsumtnam, at the moment of his departure. This being does not seem to possess corporeal form, but is rather a sight-producing medium. In the song he is often likened to a swift-flying bird; when the uninitiated hear of this they are suitably impressed with the remarkable ability of X at having such a creature sent to him. X, who has donned a [292] head-dress consisting of the white tails of two eagles, dances

[The Dance of Noakxnim]

if he so desires. The kukusiut listen to the song, and when it is resung they join in. They practise it repeatedly, until familiar with both words and tune. This part of the ceremony lasts for about two hours. 575* 796* [533]

The singers, and any others who are prepared to beat time, are always provided with long, flat, thin sounding-boards to increase the din of the pounding. When the marshals decide that the song is sufficiently familiar, they tell some of the kukusiut to carry these boards to the lowest house of the village. They do this, and also scatter clean sand on the floor, as is customary whenever a supernatural being is to enter. The uninitiated persons within the house watch with great interest. The singers enter and take their places behind the fire, then other kukusiut and finally X himself; his face is unblackened, but he wears his two eagle tails in his hair and a collar of dyed cedar-bark. On his head is a thin cylindrical circlet, about four inches high, of the same material, ornamented with swan's down by the inhabitants of the villages of the upper Bella Coola valley. The collar consists of a roll of grass, entirely covered with dyed cedar-bark from which pendant tassels of the same hang down over his chest; similar ones are worn by sisaok dancers, except that the tassels hang down their backs. Every kusiut dancer wears these two ornaments, and those who have the necessary prerogative adorn themselves with an apron of deer hooves or puffin beaks. Blankets are always worn. Kukusiut women wear in addition woollen pubic garments. [292] 534 575* 796* 292 [424] [237]

As the singers beat out X's tune, accompanied by the voices of themselves and other kukusiut, he dances. Since his style is typical of all kukusiut except Cannibals and a few others, it will be well to digress at this point in order to describe it. X raises his arms until their upper parts are approximately the height of his shoulders, and project outwards and slightly to the front; they are bent at the elbows with the forearms vertical, thus bringing the hands opposite the top of the head. Both wrists are shaken constantly, the muscles of the lower 575* 796* 535

[The Dance of NoaKxnim]

*575 arms being brought into play, so that the whole hands are con-
*796 stantly quivering without spasmodic movements. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a skilful performer, and the inces-535 sant shaking is continued without stop throughout the dance.
[533] Most kusiut songs are in five parts, which may be described as three verses, separated by two choruses. Near the beginning of the first verse X stands up, raises his arms, shakes his fingers, then slightly bends his legs and begins to step in time to the beating of the sticks. Some dancers remain almost stationary, marking time, to use the military term, others advance in steps of an inch or so, at intervals slowly revolving sunwise.[18] Sometimes X introduces a variation by bending from side to side, in which case one hand rises above the other. If the time of the song is very slow, he sinks, bending his knees to a great extent, and advances in more lengthy strides, never ceasing to shake his hands. At each chorus the time becomes so rapid that it is impossible to move the feet in accordance with it, and then X crouches, his shaking hands the only movement. If it [424] is a woman who is dancing—like most kusiut prerogatives, this [562] one is not limited to men—the style of dancing is quite different. Keeping the upper part of each arm close to her body, the dancer extends her fore-arms, outwards, parallel to the ground, with the palms upwards. Like a man, she shakes her wrists, but few female dancers move from the spot on which they start, except perhaps to turn around, sunwise. Heralds always keep up a running fire of comments, especially when a woman is dancing, urging her not to be bashful, but to allow her breasts to shake. Some dancers have merged into one [424] prerogative rights acquired from different coastal tribes. In such cases they perform in two or more styles, each part according to one prerogative.

Kukusiut are always ready to assist one of their fellows, so that three or four friends are always willing to accompany the dancer. They stand close behind him, at frequent intervals blowing over his head the eagle down which either X, or some [171] [18]The Bella Coola state that the Bella Bella revolve counter-sunwise.

[The Dance of NoaKxnim]

of his relatives, has given them for this purpose. When he 575*
crouches during the chorus they crowd close around, almost 796* concealing him. Particularly in those dances fraught with danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his 535
friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely stands up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. [593]
It is considered contrary to good manners for a father so to help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is pleased to have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bella Bella [171] certain kukusiut have definite prerogatives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bella Coola. Throughout every dance the kukusiut women utter their droning cry. [533]

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in 575*
the lowest house see. They hear the song, too, and gaze with 796* awe at X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight. Then the sounding-boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.[19] All the kukusiut now return to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A box-drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and [534] when the song has been finished two men continue in turn to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend superintend the distribution of food, which follows his final [574] dancing. As the kukusiut are eating, the marshals deliver their usual admonishments, a task that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back-wall of the house. Materials have been placed in readiness so that it is an easy matter to build a framework a few feet in height, of which the flat top is screened by a matting wall about three feet high. This is often decorated [531] with designs of dyed cedar-bark without ritual significance as far as the Bella Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the kukusiut disperse, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place.

[19] In Bella Coola, but perhaps not in Kimsquit. [184]

[The Dance of NoAKxnim]

*575 *796 X is supposed to be gazing constantly to the west, watching for another sight of Noäkxnim. With the aid of a friend, X arranges his eagle tail head-dress on a box so that it projects above the wall of the platform as if he were sitting within. The uninitiated understand that X is watching, and the motionless feathers confirm their belief. Meanwhile X remains hidden in the back-room, never leaving the house except when necessary, and then only under cover of night.

*575 *796 On the fourth day after his first vision, X stands up and cries out:

Yupälx, "The Point."

787 ●533 *[203] The significance is that X sees Noäkxnim as he appears around the first point. A herald is at once sent out. First he repeats loudly the exact words used, then departs to call the kukusiut to X's house. When they have taken their places the singers beat out a new song previously composed, the second for X. The theme describes how Noäkxnim is rounding the first promontory, in his craft which is often likened to a cloud or a flock of birds. This they practise, before carrying sounding-boards and drums to the lowest house in the village, where the singers and a number of kukusiut take up their stations. When all is ready X enters, the women utter their droning cry, and, to the accompaniment of the beating of time and the singing of his new song, he dances around the fire. This same procedure is carried out in every house of the village, working from the bottom upwards. Finally all return to X's house where they receive food and the usual admonitions from a marshal. Then they disperse. This is about 11 A.M.

X again climbs to the platform where his head-dress is arranged as if he were sitting constantly gazing towards the approaching Noäkxnim. For four days he remains hidden, and on the morning of the fifth he again cries out:

Yupälx.

This time it signifies that the supernatural one has rounded a second promontory. The same ritual is repeated, the calling [203] by the herald, the meeting in X's house, and the procession to every abode. The song on this occasion, the third for X, describes what Noäkxnum is doing on his journey, as if X were relating what he saw. The kukusiut return to X's house for another meal and the admonishments of a marshal. 575* 796* 787 533

[The Dance of Noakxnim]

For four days more X retires from sight. On the morning of the fifth day he once more calls:

Yupälx.

Exactly the same procedure is carried out, the theme of this fourth song being of how Noäkxnum can be seen rounding a third promontory.

X remains in concealment for four days more, then cries out again. This time the song describes how Noäkxnum has rounded the fourth and last promontory and how the supernatural beings above have sighted him. This is the fifth song used for X. As on the previous occasions, he conceals himself on the platform after making a tour of the village.

On the morning of the fifth day later, X cries out that Noäkxnum is at the mouth of the river where he has tied his craft to the stakes of a salmon-trap. The belief of the Bella Coola is that he approaches up an underwater fiord, into which flows an underwater river provided with a salmon-trap; X alone can see these phenomena. The herald goes from house to house repeating the announcement. The kukusiut, too, visit each, singing the song while X dances. He and the singers always decide beforehand on his actual statement, so that the words of the song will be in agreement, as if the singers had composed it on the spot. Once again X retires from sight. [203]*

Five days later he arouses the household with his loud shouting:

"Noäkxnum is in the river itself. He has reached the home of the Resident; Imimätlnaix is mooring his craft. Dakdakänmem and Ätällimktnum are greeting him." [776]

The herald repeats this news throughout the village. The uninitiated know in general terms who these supernatural beings are. The Resident lives under the water at the mouth of the river; his function is to see that the stream and the 575* 796* 776 [203]*

* 575 salmon are properly looked after, in fact, he is practically the
* 796 supernatural archetype of the River Guardian. Imimätlnaix,
"The Moorer," is a supernatural child who stays with the 776 Resident, and whose sole function appears to be the mooring of Noäkgnum's craft. Dakdakänmem is sent by Smaien·a, who in this connection appears to have human intelligence, to greet Noäkgnum, and with him come Smaien·a's son, Älällumktnum,[10] to assist Noäkgnum in poling his craft up the river. All these beings are patrons for different kukusiut. The Resident is also known as Ämtäklis.

* 575 The kukusiut assemble in X's house as on the previous
* 796 occasions; according to some informants two songs are used 787 on this day, others say only one. The people proceed in the usual manner to the lowest house, and make their way up-
[533] stream. When about half through the village, however, X shrieks out that Numätlam has brought a call to him. The woman and the heralds cry out loudly, X hastily returns to his own house, from which the uninitiated are at once expelled, and the kusiut whistles sound from within. Numätlam is one of the supernatural beings who has travelled with Noäkgnum for the sole purpose of bringing a call to X. If the calendrical
[805] experts have been successful in their reckonings, the November [821] moon will first be visible on the night of this day. Several of the older men admitted that errors were common, and that sometimes four days more had to elapse, in which it was said that Noäkgnum was poling up the river. As he passes, his dancers in the different villages receive their calls on successive nights. It is assumed that he can go by several adjacent [184] settlements on the same night, but the kusiut season is two or three days shorter in Stuix and the upper villages than in Qomqo·ts. Exact information on this point was unavailable.
* 575 As already described, Noäkgnum travels to Smaien·a, whence
* 796 he leaps to Nusqulxwaista and places his pole within the house.
All the supernatural beings crowd in after him to wait for 773 Älquntäm, but as soon as the latter enters, Noäkgnum seizes his [10]Some informants state that there are four of these beings.

pole and starts his journey downstream. 575*

Now that X has received his call, the ceremonial continues for four days more, in a manner typical of kusiut dances. Only variations from the pattern about to be described will be given in later dance rituals. 796* [773]

X spends the rest of this day on which the call has come to him, the twenty-fourth of the whole rite, within his house. In the evening a herald summons the kukusiut, this being the night of lsuxtämem. In Stuax the call used is: 575* 796* 184

Skinap Stuxao, "Cure, ye Stuax people," because it is believed that a call almost kills a Stuax person. This is probably true for the people of the other villages of the upper valley, but elsewhere this cry is used only when a novice receives his first call. In the lower valley and at Kimsquit the cry is: 203 *

Snuxexeldimut kukusiaot, "Bring light, ye kukusiut."

Care is always taken to use the right expression with reference to the locality of the dancer's repository, irrespective of where he may happen to be living. 575* 796*

All the kukusiut are expected to attend, in fact, they are glad to do so, but attendance is compulsory for novices only. When all have assembled, one of the leading singers takes command. The coming of his call is supposed to have made X light-headed, and he must be cured by a frenzied beating of sticks four times repeated. During this X himself remains quiescent. The singers now group themselves into a close circle to compose a song describing the supernatural beings seen by X during the day. As a rule, each man has one or more tunes in his mind which he hums to his associates as he softly beats time. Then another does the same, and this is repeated until unanimity of opinion is reached concerning the most suitable. The leader of the choir fits the proper words to this, assisted by his comrades and perhaps by X himself, or someone well acquainted with his prerogative.[21] As soon as the singers have finished their work they widen their circle and sing the song loudly so that it can be heard and learnt by all, 533 [787]

[21]This song, like the ones used earlier, is sometimes prepared in advance.

[The Dance of Noakxnim]

*575 while X dances to and fro behind the fire. In succession the *796 six songs previously composed are resung and X dances to 533 each. The singers would be disgraced should they forget either a tune or a text, so they take advantage of lsuxtämem to practise them all. Later in the season, when numerous kukusiut have received calls, the singers beat out the time and words for each and the owner dances. The general effect is remarkably impressive in the dim light of one of the large wooden houses, nor is the music displeasing to the ear. After the singing of X's seventh song, there is a pause while food is distributed amid the admonitions of the marshals. Once more the singers take up their sticks and beat out the song most recently composed for X; the audience joins in softly and he dances. The kukusiut now disperse with the exception of the novices who sleep in X's house. He himself does not withdraw to his platform. The ritual of X's lsuxtämem differs from that of most kukusiut since his comrades have already learnt six songs for him. On most occasions they hear and practise one only, to which he dances in the manner described.

*575 The next day is nusiutälsap. About eleven o'clock in the
*796 morning the heralds go to every house calling out:
532 Tłpänap, łłpänap, kukusiaot, "Cut, cut, ye kukusiut."
*[203] The uninitiated do not realize that this is an invitation to gather to cut wood for masks. X, or his relatives, always provides a meal which is eaten before the main work is attended to. Then the singers group themselves and compose still [533] another song[11] for X, with the same theme, but different words, as the one composed the previous evening. When ready, they chant it loudly so that all can hear and learn, and then sing it with the audience joining in, while X dances. After a short pause, X asks as many of his comrades as he desires to go with [784] him to the forest to cut wood. Some member of the party carries a whistle which he sounds at intervals, thus warning

[176] [11]This would normally be a dancer's second song, the large number practised for X before the coming of his call being unusual. Not many years ago a powerful chief created the innovation of having one song only instead of two. Some kukusiut follow his example whereas others still use two.

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*575 This ejaculation is supposed to make the work of manu-
*796 facture less difficult. The same procedure is repeated with 532 every mask ordered, except that if the being to be represented [789] is a woman, X's ejaculation is i ····. Any kusiut can make a mask, but the preference is always given to a man who has shown ability in previous tasks. The carpenters endeavour to follow well-recognized designs for many representations, but a great deal of latitude is allowed, and a workman receives greater praise and fame for turning out a fine and distinctive piece of new design, than for rigid adherence to a former type. This, combined with the burning of masks and consequent loss of permanent patterns, is responsible for the variability in Bella Coola forms, and the difficulty which they themselves experience in recognizing portrayed beings.

*575 As soon as all the carpentry has been allotted, the singers
*796 strike up one of X's eight songs. Whether or not he dances [533] to them is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion among informants. In any case the re-singing on nusiutālsap is purely for rehearsal, made necessary by the large number of songs. Later on in the kusiut season, the songs of other dancers may be practised on this night, and if the owners wish to practice their steps, it is quite proper for them to do so.
[574] Finally, a meal is distributed, while the marshals discourse in [431] the usual way. Feasts are features of all kusiut dances, and the [42] food distributed is regarded as a free-will gift, without thought of repayment. After eating, the kukusiut disperse; X must sleep within his own house, but no longer remains within his platform-enclosure.

*575 The next day, the twenty-sixth of the ceremony, is qotlum.
*796 Early in the morning a herald summons to X's house, where 532 the blocks have been left, all those to whom work has been *[203] assigned. All morning they carve diligently. The speed with which masks are completed is surprising, although this has [177] undoubtedly increased since the introduction of metal tools.
[562] In the middle of the day a few kukusiut men, no women, are invited to share "the carpenters' meal," as the food provided

*575 shals tells a herald to call them in; they enter joyfully, though *796 somewhat fearfully, and stand or crouch on either side of the doorway. In Kimsquit they gaze on the masks, wondering *[203] what they are. The singers strike up the first of X's songs and he dances, while singers and kukuxiut men sing the words and *575 the women drone. To the uninitiated it appears most impres-*796 sive and desirable, while even the prosaic white man can hardly remain indifferent. At intervals a whistle, which the 533 uninitiated believe to be the voice of the call, sounds eerily from beneath the armpit of a reliable kuxiut. After a short interval, X's second song is sung, and so in succession the eight.
Then the singers strike up any well-remembered tune, perhaps one used last year, and the owner dances. This is repeated for eight or ten songs. At later qulaw, every kuxiut who has had a call during the season must dance; the ceremony tends, therefore, to become longer and longer as time goes on, although the singing of the songs of a previous year is omitted. When enough performers have danced, a shaman's song is often sung and the owner dances "to clear the house." At this point the *575 uninitiated spectators are told to withdraw. Then a meal is *796 served to the risaak who, as members of a similar organization, [301] are honoured guests and have been seated together in a corner, [237] resplendent in their weasel-skin ornaments. After their departure, the kukuxiut eat more leisurely, while one marshal [431] after another advises them as to their conduct. Then presents of comparatively small value are distributed. The marshals would consider it unbecoming for X to provide over-lavishly.
The first gifts are to the singers, the next to the makers of the [465] masks. Though these presents are, in essence, pay, they are never thought of in that light; X is under obligations, X has cleared himself of those obligations, is the Bella Coola attitude.
When all is over, X once more dances to one of his wully sung songs. Then one of the marshals calls out to open the door and the guests disperse, except the novices who sleep in X's house.

The ooot day is nakwam,* the twenty-seventh and final day of the rite, and the most spectacular in every ceremonial. Early in the morning a herald summons the wood-workers to X's house to complete the masks. At intervals throughout the day kakwiri come to discuss with X, the marshals, the singers, and the carpenters the details of the evening ceremonial. In fact, X has less to do with the arrangements than any of those mentioned, unless he happens to be a kwiri of long standing. The marshals usually decide who shall wear the masks, although the maker of each is always consulted; X himself never wears one at his own ceremony. The kwiri who is to represent Ko'Ktsulsuis must have the ability to speak fluently and in a high-pitched voice supposedly like that of a woman. Strong men are required for some of the heavy masks such as Thunder, but most may be used by anyone. A person asked to wear one seldom refuses, although he is liable to punishment in case of dropping it or any other accident. No one marshal can dictate who shall wear a particular mask, all these matters are arranged with endless discussion during the day; stage management is not a highly developed Bella Coola profession. The masks are completed by the afternoon at latest, painted, and concealed behind a nootsing enclosure, one of which is built in each rear corner of the house. Sometimes the back-room itself is used to hide the sacred objects and only one shelter is constructed. The makers of the masks remain there with them, to assist in tying them over the heads of the wearers. Meanwhile all chips are swept up and burnt and the house made tidy for the evening.

As twilight falls a herald goes to every house inviting the kakwiri to assemble in X's. The uninitiated gather outside the door, waiting eagerly for the summons to enter and see the wonders; their curiosity, and fear, piqued by the sound of a whistle from within. But there are still delays; many of the kakwiri wish to express themselves concerning the conduct of

Among the passengers in Nuḱymm's canoe are a number of singers, who replace the usual ones on this occasion. Each wears the same type of mask, painted with red diagonals, and with white feathers* projecting from the top. After the uninitiated have gazed for some time upon the wonders, their leader, Swaḱwenimatik, takes his place and his followers begin to beat out an ancient song, believed to be sung in Nuḱymm's craft as it nears Bella Coola. The theme is:

"See me, mortals, I am Nawanaiokdimat Nuḱymm, the dancer of Nuḱymm."

As the music starts, a figure rises from among the singers, wearing a mask with heavy eye-brows and carrying a light staff about six feet in length, wound spirally with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with a tassel of dyed bark. Holding this in his hand he begins to dance lightly, running back and forth a few steps at a time in time to the beating of sticks, lifting his feet freely from the ground, and bending back and forth in airy grace, all the while waving his wand to and fro. There are no fixed steps, the only essential is that he convey the impression of being light of foot and a good dancer; accordingly, the person selected for this purpose is one with these qualifications. As he moves, Ana'kimdaiate explains to the uninitiated that this is Nawanaiokdimat, a dancer of great repute who accompanies Nuḱymm and guards his singers. At this point Ana'kimdaiate's own song may or may not be sung. It never varies, and is believed to have been handed down from dim antiquity. X himself must be the singer, accordingly it can be sung only when the dancer has a good voice. If this is the case, the marshals request him to perform, and, if necessary, teach him the exact words. X, standing behind the fire, sings alone and unaccompanied, then the singers repeat the song in unison with the beating of their sticks, and Ana'kimdaiate herself dances, using, of course, the feminine style. At this juncture the uninitiated must be so-leave the thud on the roof, which is made by an accomplice, is the call itself, or a being bringing it to X, is problematical. All non-members are expelled immediately, including guests other than Kimsquit or Tâl-is Ankaciut. One is tempted to conjecture whether or not the donor of the potlatch does not use this rite as a means of getting rid of his guests if they show a disposition to linger too long. 575* 796* [787] [556]

The call having come to X, this is the day of Ituntowm. In the early evening a herald goes up and down the platform outside the houses, calling out in effect:

"He has been pressed to earth beneath the weight."

No mention is made of who "he" may be, although the uninitiated are well aware. The herald then enters each house in order, starting at the bottom, to invite the Ankaciut to assemble in X's. After he has been aided by the beating of sticks, four times repeated, the singers seat themselves behind the fire, where X joins them. The fiction is always carried out that the call has brought him a song, which he pretends to sing or recite to the singers who appear to be listening intently. Usually he says nothing, or talks about something else, though sometimes the deception is furthered by X first learning the words from the musicians and repeating them as if teaching. 575* 796* 556* [787]

The theme is always of the supernatural persons and how the offering converts them. Since only Ankaciut are present and since they all understand the methods, this part of the ceremony may be slighted.* The singers beat out and sing the song a number of times, softly, as if practicing, then more loudly for the benefit of the audience, and finally at full strength while X dances. Later in the season when many Ankaciut have performed, and there is danger of the songs being forgotten, it is customary to sing them over on the night of Ituntowm while the owner of each song dances. Throughout, the whistle sounds, to the awe of the uninitiated in the other 575* 796*

*Even when no uninitiated are present, the Ankaciut always surround their ceremonials with an air of mystery which obviously affects themselves.

[The Cannibal Dance]

575 is writhing so violently that it appears as if it would be only a 796 few moments before he breaks loose and runs amuck. Closely 787 guarded by a band of ḱukuciut, the second Cannibal is now taken to every house of the village. He seems to be striving to enter, and to be restrained by the ḱukuciut. All the time he growls and calls out:

I —— .

The call of ewe can be used only by a Cannibal who has returned from the realms above. X meanwhile remains in his own house, to which the substitute is finally brought and the cannibalistic incubus returned by the call of ye — four times repeated.

It was impossible to learn the details of a rite that occurs during the afternoon of this day. The singers have composed [533] two songs for X, one describing his adventures in the land aloft, and the other the return of the incubus which made him a flesh-eating brute. It appears probable that during the afternoon the ḱukuciut assemble in X's house to learn these songs. It might be added that the ritual of a Cannibal dance differs widely from that of most ḱuciut ceremonies, since there is no qulaw and no nakwaw; the uninitiated believe that the whole affair is so serious that they are not surprised at ritualistic eccentricities.

In the evening the ḱukuciut are first summoned to X's house, and later the uninitiated. X is sitting close to the singers, with a number of ḱukuciut grouped around him in case he should become frenzied. The singers first sing over the [533] song describing the return of the Cannibal power, with the ḱukuciut joining in softly. The chorus of every Cannibal song consists of the words:

Hémdmai, hémdmai, kém', kém'.

[711] It is said that this same refrain is used in all Cannibal songs by the Bella Bella and Fort Rupert people; the Bella Coola, ignorant of the meaning of the words, affirm that they have none.

[533] X now talks in a low tone of voice to the singers, as if telling them of his adventures, and presently they begin to sing the song, as if they had just learnt the theme from X. Frequently the deception is increased by X first learning the song and repeating it to the singers in a voice sufficiently loud for the uninitiated to hear. The theme of this, and every other song used for Cannibals, is of the land above and the dangers which X has survived. The singers add new facts and information to vary the monotony, but the subjects usually described are:

The flat land above with its many trails and the river that flows through it

The gale constantly raging there which has blown the hair from X's head and the dirt from his body.

The trail across a yawning chasm over which his supernatural strength enabled him to leap. If a Cannibal dies when in concealment the kukusiut bury the corpse secretly and tell the uninitiated that his power failed him on the other side of the abyss so that he was unable to return. [766] [761]

Alpaxsim under his various names.

How his patron helped him to escape the Alskam, "They of the Huge Jaws," evil beings who tried to kill X by sucking him into their gaping mouths. [776]

The tide-flats which are found at the edge of the flat land above.

The kindly being Sinunukālāhm, who gave him the necessary power to cross the chasm. The uninitiated believe that unless a Cannibal meets this being he will be unable to return. [776] [761]

No one song for any Cannibal contains references to all these beings and events, but it is on these that the singers draw for their themes, always altering and adding to produce a fine effect.

On this occasion X does not dance,[*] and the uninitiated are soon expelled. As the kukusiut are eating, one marshal after another praises X for what he has done, and gives the most solemn warnings to all as to the necessity of completing 575* 796* 787

[*] There is diversity of opinion on this point.

*575 the rites satisfactorily. Towards midnight the gathering *796 breaks up.

Many of the younger and more athletic kukusiut sleep in 787 X's house, ready to assist him in the "Running Song." About an hour and a half before dawn the uninitiated are awakened by confused shouting and growling from X's house; above the din rises X's ghastly, xwa·, xwa·, xwa·.

The shouting and noise lead to a spot at the rear of the village, whither X has gone with the musicians and about twenty kukusiut. Presently the singers begin to chant forth [533] a new song, X's third, of which the theme is again the Cannibal's adventures in the land above; the uninitiated readily believe that he has taught the singers these words, though they had been unable to hear them from within the houses. There is more shouting as X runs to a second place behind the village, where the same song is used once more. When this has been repeated four times, X is led back to his house.

For four days the uninitiated remain in a constant state of terror. Although the expulsion of the cannibalistic incubus has tended to restore X's sanity, he is still wild, unable either to eat or sleep. Twice every night the madness conquers him, and he dashes from his house, barely restrained by his faithful kukusiut attendants. Eager for the flesh of human beings, he rushes at the doors, knocks them down if they should be closed, growling furiously, but his guardians always succeed in dragging him out before he does any real damage. This is repeated at every house of the village. Since the uninitiated are too frightened to look out, it often happens that a substitute takes the place of X on these semi-nightly excursions. During the day he remains within his own house, concealed, on a platform built for him between the fire and the back-room.

On the fourth evening, the fifth after his return from above, the kukusiut are summoned to his house to soothe him so that he will lie down on this platform and rest. The uninitiated, listening eagerly but fearfully, hear once more the sound of the frenzied stick-beating. The heralds inform them that X

[The Cannibal Dance]

*575 to the woods he is always accompanied by a number of kukusiut
*796 to drive the uninitiated from his path. If it were necessary to perform the full rite just described, it would, in effect, limit 556 this dance to wealthy individuals. One reason why it is possible for a poor Bella Coola to become a Cannibal is that on his second, or subsequent, ceremonial, he can give an abbreviated rite, known as lilstom. The essence of this is *575 that a kindly supernatural being has visited X on earth, saving
*796 him from the perils of going aloft. In this case the ritual 787 closely follows that of a normal kusiut dance and is concluded in four days.

After the nebusam rites of some other kusiut have been concluded, the call comes to X, who responds by growling and biting a few people. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house. Thanks to the friendly intervention of the supernatural being, usually Alquntäm, X's mental powers are unimpaired so that he does not become infuriated and bites only a few individuals. As with ordinary kusiut rites, the singers [533] beat out a song composed for the occasion, describing the beneficent being who came down to X, and the kukusiut practise and learn it. No other songs are rehearsed on this night, owing to the extreme solemnity of the occasion; it is a Cannibal rite and nothing can take place at the same time.

The next day is nusiutälsap; a second song is composed [532] and a number of the kukusiut are sent to collect wood for [776] masks. Six of these must be constructed representing the following supernatural beings:

Alquntäm, who has benignly interfered to save X from risking the dangers of a trip aloft.

Alqoteos, a supernatural man-eater from whom the call has come impelling X to eat flesh.

Three Ällipaist, "Holders," who restrain Alqoteos. In the land above their function corresponds to that of the kukusiut who guard a Cannibal.

Ano'likwulsaix.

In the evening, after the work has been allotted, X's two

*575 They do not blacken their faces on receipt of a call as do 424 most kukusiut.

[302] The theme of their songs is of the land above, instead solely [787] of their patrons.

[533] On visiting a house where a qotlum or nebusam is taking place they sit with the Cannibals in one of the back corners; this group is given food before any of the other guests.

They do not exercise their prerogative on fellow-Scratchers, Cannibals, or Breakers.

[787] They are liable to frenzy both when the call is upon them and after its departure. In such cases they run forth, apparently guarded and restrained by other kukusiut, and rush into every house to frighten the uninitiated.

They must recompense those whom they have scratched.

[578] They act as peace-makers among the kukusiut, since the necessity of accompanying a Scratcher who pretends to be frenzied overrules all petty causes of strife.

[554] Though any definite concept of graded rank in the kusiut society is quite foreign to the Bella Coola, it is generally felt that Scratchers and Breakers are only slightly less important than Cannibals. The patron of every Scratcher is Sno'olxdis [776] Alqantām, one of the sons of Alqantām; this supernatural being scratches the supernatural ones in the land above, and his father alone can restrain him. The prerogative is fairly common, and it is probable that in early days there was at least one Scratcher in every village.

*575 The following account of the ritual was obtained from one +796 of the Bella Coola marshals and describes the manner in which the dance should have been performed by the Scratcher, [424] Alushnaix, his daughter's daughter's son, who had recently obtained the prerogative formerly possessed by his deceased mother's father. It will be convenient to refer to Alushnaix as X and use the present tense in recording the proper ritual, though it was largely omitted on the last occasion the dance was given.

X arranges a suitable day with the marshals for receiving his call, and when this has been settled, he informs those kukusiut whom he plans to honour by scratching. Since each will have to be recompensed for allowing X to display his prerogative, their number depends on X's wealth. Early in the morning of the day chosen, which is always immediately after the nebusam of some other kusiut, the call comes, and X gives a low hoot. At once he starts wildly rushing around and scratching, so that the uninitiated are only too willing to flee from his terrifying presence. Throughout the day X is escorted by a number of kukusiut to every house, where he rages around the fire, throwing his arms to and fro in an infuriated manner, sometimes scratching one of his fellows, but more often merely acting as if he desired to do so. The uninitiated hide within the bedrooms, greatly impressed by what they see if they dare to look forth. 575* 796* [424]

Towards evening the kukusiut are summoned to X's house, where a dramatic representation, into which the members fully enter, is made of binding him as if he were a wild animal or a lunatic. A rope is stretched around the fire, held by the kukusiut, with X inside. He pretends to be trying to escape, while the rope-holders bend down and move around to hold him within their bonds. Meanwhile a shaman, or some senior kusiut, leads a frenzied beating of sticks which is four times repeated, to cure the madness. A kusiut then grasps the Scratcher's face and moves his mouth four times, to make sure that his jaws can move properly; the meaning of this is unknown. X now takes one of the beating-sticks and sits down among the singers as if about to teach them both tune and words of a song describing his knowledge of the land above, derived from his call. For a few moments he beats sanely, and appears to speak in a rational manner, but soon he goes off in a wild frenzy of senseless pounding. Heip, heip, cry the kukusiut to soothe him. After this has been several times repeated, the singers announce that they have learnt X's song, though of course, they have composed one themselves in readiness for the occasion. They now sing it; the audience listens, [757] [533]

[The Scratch Dance]

*575 and the heralds keep telling all to be attentive. The chorus
*796 for every Scratcher's song consists of the supposedly meaning-[533] less words, 'aii, 'aii, as if a child were crying. It is said that the ● same refrain is used for Scratch dances by every coastal tribe.
[171] After this practice the singers chant forth X's song more loudly, the audience joins in, and he dances. The Scratch
*575 dance differs from all other kusiut ones in that there are no
*796 fixed movements, with the exception of keeping time to the 535 beating of sticks with the feet. The dancer sometimes bends down and forward, with arms closely pressed between his legs, or he bends back with arms thrown upwards; to and fro and back and forth he goes with high steps or short mincing ones, with hops or jumps, his arms waving like the arms of a windmill. The best Scratch dancer is the one who can put most action and originality into his movements. The weird effect is increased by moving the facial muscles to cause strange grimaces. Four kukusiut, two before and two behind, accompany *575 X. At intervals he becomes excited and seizes his own hair
*796 as if in internal agony, whereupon his guardians press the back of his neck and call hop to soothe him. His dance completed, he sits down, and no other performers follow him. The [431] presents provided by X and his relatives are then distributed, those scratched and the song makers being the chief recipients, although everyone receives something. Then there is the usual meal, accompanied by admonitions from the marshals, followed by X dancing once more to his song.

Unlike most kusiut ceremonials, this does not complete the night's rites. Accompanied by a number of kukusiut, X visits every house in the village, and dances around the fire with wildly waving arms while the whistle sounds eerily. Since the [535] musicians do not beat time, his dance is without rhythmic qualities, otherwise it follows the lack of pattern just described. When he is brought back to his own house, the frenzied beating of sticks is twice repeated to soothe him, and water is thrown over him. Thus pacified, X goes to sleep and the kukusiut quietly disperse.

obey one prohibition; he must not sleep with his wife for four days. 575* 796*

Like a Cannibal, X is liable to frenzy for the rest of the ceremonial season. During this period he remains secluded within his house, and the uninitiated willingly avoid him, believing him to be mentally deranged. He attends every kusiut dance, where his latent madness helps to frighten the uninitiated. If strangers from Kimsquit or Täl·io visit Bella Coola, he at once becomes frenzied, rushes to the beach and scratches them, precisely as a Cannibal would do; in this case he must be pacified in the same manner. A Scratcher always saves goods to recompense scratched foreigners. If it is the first time that X has danced, he must remain secluded for the following summer, and give his ceremony the next winter. During the warm months he remains within the back-room of his house, and though some of the uninitiated know of his presence, still believing him mad they do not intrude upon his privacy. The coming of foreigners during this period excites him to frenzy and he scratches them, irrespective of the time of year. [834] [828]

It might be mentioned that some Scratcher names are indicative of the dancer's function, and others, such as "The Cause of Fear," have reference to his prowess. [551]

THE BREAKER DANCE

When a Bella Coola speaks of the fear which kusiut dances cause the uninitiated, he almost invariably cites in order the Cannibal, Scratch, and Breaker dances. Kukusiut with these three prerogatives have no more privileges than other members of the society, nor are they considered superior in rank, but similarity in their functions leads to an almost automatic association. If questioned further, a Bella Coola will usually say that he regards the Cannibal dance to be first, with the Scratch and Breaker equal, but less important. Breakers share with Cannibals and Scratchers the prerogatives of not blackening their faces; of having as theme for their songs the land 575* 796* 424 [781] [554] [302] [533] [264]

[The Breaker Dance]

*575 *796 above; of sitting in one of the back corners and receiving the first food at ritual meals; of paying those on whom they [424] exercise their prerogative, and of liability to frenzy on arrival [533] of strangers. This last prerogative, if it may be so termed, [264] lasts for the ceremonial season, and in the case of a novice, for the following summer as well. Moreover, Breakers do not destroy the goods of fellow-Breakers, Scratchers, or Cannibals.

*575 *796 424 539 In view of the similarity of this rite to those already described, no effort was made to collect full details. Different Breakers have minor variations in ritual, similar to those already illustrated. The following is an account of the manner in which the Breaker, Sxek of Snuləli, performed the rite a number of years ago. As on previous occasions, it will be convenient to use the present tense, and to refer to the dancer as X. Sxek gave the following account of the origin of his prerogative.

Long, long ago, soon after the first people had come to this earth, a marriage was about to take place in the village of Snulł-ał. At that distant period the people were so powerful that they could themselves initiate kusiut dances, and the bridegroom determined to do so in honour of the event. He chose to imitate the actions of Sänolłxmulełis Älqunäm, one of Älqunäm's sons, whom he remembered having seen throwing stones in his father's house before he, the bridegroom, was sent down to this world.[42] When goods were piled up ready for distribution as marriage presents, the man began to hurl stones around; one of them ricochetted from a box, struck his bride and killed her. This unforeseen accident solved the question of his name, as by universal consent it was decided that he should be called, Sxek, "He of the Faulty Aim."

Since that time a law has been enforced that no Breaker may throw a rock except ceremonially during his dance, and the marshals punish one who disobeys this injunction. If a Breaker is in the forest with a number [231] of kukusiut, it does not matter if he fails to uphold this tradition; the essential is that the uninitiated do not see him cast a stone, even at a yelping dog, the usual reason for doing so in Bella Coola.

*575 *796 When X wishes to dance he must first obtain the consent of the marshals in the usual manner. He also arranges with kukusiut to have boxes and other wooden objects placed within the house to serve as targets, and stones as ammunition. As soon as the call comes, X cries out, begins to throw stones at these objects, and the uninitiated are at once expelled. X is usually led, closely guarded, to every house where he casts more rocks, and may break a number of utensils. Since it is well known that, under normal circumstances, he must never throw a stone, the uninitiated are convinced that he must indeed be animated by a strange power. This being lsuxtämem, the kukusiut gather in X's house during the evening to learn and practise one, or sometimes two, songs for him. If X is a novice, the theme is of his ancestor and the accident which originated the dance; on later occasions it is of his patron and the land above. All Breakers do not have Sänoltsumulelts Älquntäm as patron; some have Snukilmäls, a supernatural being who causes wealth to curl up and come to him. The chorus is the same as for Scratchers, the meaningless words, 'aii, 'aii. It is said that this same refrain is used by the Breakers of all coastal tribes, so that their songs can be distinguished from those of Scratchers only by the words. With the food, presents are given to recompense those on whom X has displayed his prerogative, that is, those whose utensils have been broken. Sometimes canoes and other valuable objects are destroyed by Breakers, depending entirely on their desire to exhibit their right.

575* 796* [787] 575* 796* 533 575* 796* [431] [424]

Next morning, nusiutälsap, X again becomes frenzied and rushes from house to house, destroying property. Of course this is later paid for, but the uninitiated have no idea that arrangements had been made for the boxes and other objects to be placed in suitable spots. During the day a number of kukusiut are sent to collect wood for nine masks. When members of the society gather in the evening the songs are practised, and the making of the masks allotted. One of these is of Sänoltsumulelts Älquntäm, four are of Breakers in the land above,[a] four of supernatural beings who sing there for the supernatural Breakers, and one of the inevitable Ano'likuo-

in the village announcing that a call has come to X. Meanwhile forty or fifty kukusiut have surrounded X and accompany him as he leaves his home and proceeds to the end of the village furthest downstream. He enters the lowest house, followed by his escort, and stops before the central fire to call out: 575* 796* 787

He circles the fire, sunwise, repeats his call a second time and leaves. The same procedure is repeated in every house in the village, in order from bottom to top, before he returns to his own home. The uninitiated are told that some power has come upon him, but that it is so strange that even he cannot comprehend it. After a short pause, X again sallies forth, accompanied as before, and calls twice in every house of the village. The same ritual is repeated a third time, but on the fourth round, which soon follows, he carries a knife in his hand. Thus it becomes plain to all that X has received power enabling him to have his stomach cut, and the kukusiut show signs of grief at the danger to which their fellow is about to be exposed. Needless to say, the delay in interpreting the call adds to the mystification of the uninitiated, and their wonder at X's power. The heralds do their part by repeating his words with their own comments. [781]

When X finally returns to his own house the heralds summon all the kukusiut to it and the customary ritual of lsxtämem takes place. The singers beat out and practise a song composed by one of their members for X, the audience listens attentively and then practises it until all are proficient. The theme of every kusiotem song is of the land above and the supernatural beings resident there. The wordless chorus consists of wai'aiye'iu, which the Bella Coola state is the refrain of all kusiotem dances up and down the coast. 575* 796* 533

The second day, nusiutälsap, a second song is composed and a party sent to the forest to bring in wood suitable for masks. In the evening part of the work is allotted[10] and the songs practised. For kusiotem dances, in addition to masks, a 575* 796* 532 [533]

be slaughtered before one is found with skin to match.[47] The marshals carefully supervise all these arrangements, but of course on this night the work alone is allotted. The entrails of several dogs are kept and worn by X between his false stomach and the wooden frame. 575* 796* [281]

After the allotment of tasks in connection with the mechanical work required, the marshals ask four women to come forward. Those selected are usually old people with good voices who, from long experience at the dances, have mastered the two[48] songs used at each kusiotem dance. The theme of these never varies and is believed to have been handed down from the distant past. No prerogative is attached; the marshals and singers merely choose four women whom they think will be good performers. The songs resemble those sung at mourning ceremonies; in fact, they are used with that significance when X has been "killed" by disembowelling. The singers, the women chosen, the marshals, and any other kakusiut who feel competent to do so, discuss in an animated manner the exact wording and tunes of the songs. Then the musicians beat out the time and the women sing one after another, while the audience drones. In view of the solemnity of the occasion, it often happens that senior singers from adjacent villages are invited to be present to render assistance. The necessity for practising X's songs, apportioning the carpentry, and rehearsing the mourning songs has taken up more time than is usual on a nusiustälrap night, and it is late before all is completed. Then, after the usual meal and admonishments, the people disperse. 575* 796* 533

Early the following morning the carpenters and those to whom work has been allotted gather early in X's house. A band, about two feet long, composed of alternate strands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark is prepared and placed on the 575* 796* 211

This sign is a warning to the uninitiated that the kukusiut are working within, and none but a member of the society must enter or even pass on the sidewalk outside the door.[69] The central fire is moved forward to leave a larger space than usual between it and the back-room, and two mattings are raised to form two enclosures, one in each of the rear corners.

All day the carpenters work feverishly, and in the evening the kukusiut are once again summoned. When last performed, the rite on qothm was curtailed, and informants could give only an outline of the proper procedure. It appears that X's two [533] songs are practised, as well as the two mourning songs sung by the chosen women. Then all sit silent as if in grief, while the women occasionally utter mournful ejaculations, dreading the danger to which X will be exposed. At this juncture the uninitiated are summoned; they are impressed by the gravity and obvious fears shown even by the members of the powerful kusiut society. In the tense silence, one of the ānuyex suddenly bursts forth:

He reaches up his arms and makes the motions of drawing something towards him from above, while the kukusiut women drone and the singers and others provided with sticks keep up a clamorous beating on the floor. Presently another ānuyex does likewise, and so on until as many as wish to do so have drawn down their puppet-patrons. The heralds maintain a running fire of comments to aid in impressing non-members. The customary lengthy dancing of qothm is omitted, and the uninitiated are expelled at once. The kukusiut have the usual

The other uninitiated marvel that any of their number should be bold enough to taunt the kukusiut, ignorant of the fact that those who do so are really spies whose part in the performance has long since been arranged by the marshals. Instances are remembered when the wooden or copper frame [688] was defective and the performer was killed; in such a case the spies actually slew one or more kukusiut to preserve the prestige of the society. Exact details were unobtainable, but it seems clear that the victims were selected with the aid of the marshals during the night; they were, of course, men of little importance in the community.

The spies prevent anyone from leaving the house and gradually the din subsides, except for the constant wailing of the women, particularly X's relatives. The kukusiut, granted a respite until dawn, allow some of the uninitiated to come forward and pass sunwise around the fire to see the corpse of X with the bloody entrails exposed. At this juncture, the old *575 women selected for the purpose sing the mourning song, of *796 which the words and tune never vary; they are believed to 539 is of Snitsmän a, a kindly supernatural woman[74] who restores to life kukusiut killed in the performance of their rites. The singer in the upper, eastern, rear corner of the house sings the following words:

Nuxsmdzam ixwakstk'	yas disisiyäkmidjatsu	siyulaqailaxsli

After a short interval, she is answered by the singer in the lower, western, rear corner of the house as follows: 575* 796* 533 539

Sapankotsānitwawit	itlasnitsman·aatdja	skāpālpālyālosdas
Let there come to earth	the voice of Snitsmāu·a	to revive diyālāhaipm·ilsutdai

the one who has so injured himself.

The general meaning of this song is obvious, although there are several obscure expressions which serve to increase the wonder and fear of the uninitiated. Silence follows the singing, then whistling is heard and a herald announces that one of the puppet-patrons inserted into X has left him and gone to the region above. Similar whistling announces the departure of others at intervals. When several have done so, it is time for the first to return. A thud, made by a hidden accomplice, is heard on the roof and whistling breaks out afresh. Sometimes the puppet-patron returns to X, but more often to its invoker, and the transference previously enacted is repeated over the body of the dancer who continues to lie as if lifeless. Now and then the uninitiated are invited forward to look at him and they notice that the gaping wound is slowly closing, an easy matter to arrange in the dim light of the house. At intervals the puppet-patrons go and return from the land above, and the proceedings are sometimes enlivened by the owners telling a herald, who in turn informs the audience, what the puppet-patron saw on its journey aloft. Usually each goes and returns four times in the course of the night. Each of the women selected to sing the mourning songs performs once, standing in a corner of the house and waving a wand wound with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. So the long night passes. Towards dawn continuous whistling is heard. This is made by several men with a whistle apiece; each begins to blow as soon as the breath of his partner is nearly exhausted. It is known to be the voice of Snitsmāu·a. In Kimsquit, but not in Bella Coola, this is the signal for the entry of the giant toad. Carpenters have made a wooden figure of the amphibian and by means of concealed strings it is

*575 *796 [533] made to hop towards X and bend four times over him. The wound gradually comes together, and the excitement grows ever greater. Those near X cry out that his little toes are moving, as indeed they are, then in succession his fourth, middle, first, and big toes begin to twitch convulsively. It is often difficult to find an assistant capable of moving his toes in the proper order.

"He is alive again," call the heralds, and some of the uninitiated come forward to watch the marvel of the dead man's toes moving.

*575 *796 533 X grows gradually stronger and begins to shake his hands as if he were trying to dance. Then, in a feeble voice, he begins to sing, though the only word which comes clearly is Switsmdw-a, the name of the supernatural woman through whose kindly mediation he has been restored to life. This song has actually been composed by the singers and taught by them to X preparatory to the rite. It resembles a shaman's, since it is assumed that X has practically been made a shaman by the intervention of Switsmdw-a. The singers pretend to be listening intently, and then chant it over, as if they had just learnt it, while X shakes his hands as if dancing. The wailing and weeping of the kukuxiut women has given place to joy, and those who had been singing mourning songs dance in time to the music. One after the other the dwayur who had cast their patrons into X now go to him to recall them. Each bends over him and pretends to extract something by pressure with cupped hands, at the same time crying out koip, koip.

*575 *796 987

Each dwayur then goes through the motions of casting something up into the air with cries of the same nature; this serves to return his patron to the mysterious region whence it had come. The uninitiated are now expelled and the kukuxiut soon follow, without receiving a meal.[14] Those who have taken a leading part in the ceremony usually linger with the marshals

* 575 The singers have also composed a song for each of the ānuyax
* 796 and these too must be practised, while the men dance or remain 533 still as they think fit. Since no uninitiated are present the affair is purely a rehearsal. The words of each of these songs is of the manner in which the patron helped X to survive his ordeal. By this time it is late and the kukusiut disperse after the usual meal and admonitions of the marshals.

* 575 The next day, qothm, the carpenters assemble early in the
* 796 morning to start work. Since X is entitled to portray any of 532 the supernatural beings who are companions of his patron in the land above, it follows that there is wide variation in his choice of masks to be manufactured. The principal supernatural beings are always shown, and any animals, since all are supernatural, can likewise be displayed. As usual, a few kukusiut are invited at midday to share the meal provided for the carpenters. The number of masks to be provided is often so great that two days or more are necessary for their completion, in which case no ceremony takes place on the night which would normally be qothm; the kukusiut merely gather [533] and again practise their songs.

* 575 But the day after is qothm. At dusk the kukusiut are called
* 796 in for a final rehearsal of the songs, and then a summons is sent [515] to the uninitiated, who have been washing and beautifying themselves in eager anticipation. In Kimsquit it is customary [532] to hang some of the masks on a sloping pole behind the fire and [184] the sight of these amazes the non-members. First the singers
[981] beat out the song of one of the women mourners and she dances in time to it, while the heralds near the door keep up a steady
[535] stream of remarks, encouraging the woman to perform yet
[834] more strenuously and to have no modesty about shaking her breasts. Then another of the women dances, followed in succession by the third and fourth if that is the number who sang the mourning songs. Next the ānuyax perform, each in succession accompanying the song composed for him. Now comes the central feature of the evening, the performance of X himself. As the singers strike up the shaman's song which he is

*575 *796 532 tells them that he wants a mask made to represent his own face. The purpose for which it is destined is not mentioned, although there is no reason why the workmen, all of them kukusiut, should not know, as they actually do. X blackens his face a trifle, making it easier to depict, and lies down as model for the carpenters, who at once start chiselling masks. Each works independently, and usually finishes one, or even two or three, in a day. Five or six carpenters are labouring simultaneously, and when the first group of masks has been finished the marshals, and perhaps one or more influential chiefs as well, come to inspect the handicraft. The masks are laid out in a glade of the forest and the marshals make their criticisms.

"No. The nose is too long," they say of one mask, or,

"The cheeks are too full," with regard to another.

It is seldom that one of the first group of completed masks meets with their approval, but the next morning the carpenters try once more, with X again lying down as model. In the evening the marshals again examine the results. Hundreds (probably an exaggeration) are often made before one is found which satisfies every requirement, and if the carpenters fail to produce a realistic portrait, the rite cannot be carried out. The unsuccessful attempts are carefully hidden in the forest lest they should be seen by an uninitiated person. When Owiewalcas performed the rite, it was near the end of September before one of the carpenters succeeded in making a satisfactory model.

When the wooden representation has been completed, there is no further doubt about holding the ceremony, and one of the marshals, acting for X, summons the singers and other influential kukusiut to the secret meeting place for a discussion of preliminaries.[16] At this conference X tells the carpenters what he proposes to give them as presents for the work they have done for him; the concept of "pay" is entirely lacking although it is an essential part of the transaction. The singers are told [465] [431] [533]

to prepare three songs for X, choosing as themes the usual Sacrum form, with any additional details from the performer's myth which he may give them. The marshals instruct the maker of the successful mask to put hair on it and to attach a neck.

Four days later the same group again meets in the house and X tries on the mask. When in position it rests on top of his own head with a stick passing down behind his neckpiece to his waist, where it is fastened by a belt; the general effect is that he has a superimposed head. Minor adjustments are suggested and made and X takes the mask, while the unsuccessful attempts are burned. The marshals solemnly warn the participants of the seriousness of the rite in which they are about to engage. X conceals the mask with great care in some cleft of the mountains.

At intervals the singers meet and listen to the songs each has composed, until they decide on the three most suitable, which they practise.

Nothing more takes place until after the winter solstice, when X and the marshals select the exact date for the rite. After a pahos, the marshals, singers, carpenters, and other Sacrum functionaries remain in the house to rehearse the coming ceremony. The head is placed in position, supported by a framework of reeds which can be separated by strong pressure. When X raises his blanket over his own head, the mask portrait alone is visible, and only the wearer's extra height might cause suspicion. Around his "neck," in reality the junction between X's own head and the false one, is tied a rope, so arranged that when pulled from each end, it slips, contracts on the reed framework, and ultimately runs through it to separate the head from the body.* Raw meat and blood have been placed inside the "neck" so that, when the mask is pulled off, it appears as if X's flesh were exposed and he falls to the

[The Bleeding Dance]

(28) THE BELLA COOLA INDIANS

X begins to move his fingers in a feeble way and to sing a shaman's song of which Intermediate a is the only intelligible word. Of course the singers have previously taught him as much as is necessary of this type of composition, but the assumption is that he has just learnt it from Intermediate a who has restored him to life. At this juncture two shamans often approach X and appear to project some power into him whereby he is able to rise and slowly circle the fire, supported by them. He shakes his hands and sings in a weak voice, then sounds behind the fire, still supported by the two shamans. This concludes the night's ceremony and the novitiate tell the uninitiated to leave. The Intermediate now follow, except carpenters, singers, and any other influential members of the society who desire to wait to discuss the performance.

As in the Tsimsian Cutting dance, four days more of ceremonial follow the severing of X's head, with ritual corresponding to that of an ordinary Initial performance. Furthermore circus on the night after the decapitation. The Intermediate gather in good time to hear a song, the theme of which is X's person, the supernatural being Intermediate Shamanism, who has his head pulled off during dances in the last circus. Mention is always made of Intermediate a as well. No further description is required of the ceremonial on the nights of controlling and pulling.

On unknown the first spectacle is a representation of what takes place in the last circus. A mask has been prepared similar to the one worn by X, so that it can be pulled entirely from his body. This decapitation is performed by masked figures while the heralds and novitiate explain that this is what is done shall. The upper mask is hidden and the performer, who wears one identical with that which has been pulled from him, stands up to show the uninitiated that his head has been restored to him. Since the performers are supposed to be supernatural beings, it is possible for the beheaded one to be restored more rapidly than was possible when X, a mortal, suffered the same fate. After this decapitation there follows a from a distance. When one of the participants has spotted the object, it is drawn to shore and carried into the house. The committee are then called in and seven, often covering their heads with blankets to prevent their spirits being drawn from them. None of the Bella Coola appears to know what generally, in the old days, the choice between these two performances.

The Fungus dance differs considerably from typical dance circuits already described. In part this is certainly due to decay of custom. When the writer witnessed the dance in the winter of 1913-14 it was carried out very crudely by Dundelbe, who, unwilling to admit this, was secretive about the proper ritual. Consequently, the performance of the dance was more of a hindrance than a help to the investigator. But even when full weight is given to this circumstance, it is clear that the Fungus dance is peculiar, particularly in the omission of conical figures as referents.

The ritual on this occasion was further complicated by the fact that Dundelbe has also the prerogative of dancing at an eclipse of either the sun or the moon, and instead on this fact being brought out in connection with his songs. Some of these were composed instead of the usual two, and the supernatural beings described in them were:

Ngamdim: under the waves of Dundelbe.

The Moon.

Sasim-a: This was introduced on account of being the place from which the salmon-bringer hops to the sun. A mask representing this place of purified power is always painted with salmon designs and the blanket of the wearer is decorated in the same way.

The Sasim months that act as posts at the ends of the sun's course.

Ulilim: A supernatural being dwelling under the river who is able to use a fungus in a dance held there. Detailed information about this creature could not be obtained.

At any eclipse, no matter when the season of the year or time of day, X must sing. The heralds call everyone to his house where the singers at once composes a new song, describing sun or moon as the case may be. They then sing it while X dances. Other kalaciw have the prerogative of dancing at an eclipse of the sun, and still others at an eclipse of the moon, but X claims to be the only one entitled to dance at both.

THE WINTERY DANCE

Wintery is the key-note of all kachin dances, but in the one named Hwaiwind that element is brought home so forcibly to the uninitiated that it may aptly be called the Dance of Wintery. The Bella Coola explain that the word Hwaiwind means engine, "Where Is Hidden." The essence of the rite, as explained to non-members, is that the supernatural power which has come to the dancer is unloosed in three supernatural beings or in manifestations of them. Unless someone genuine is hesitant, the performer will die. The Wintery dance is one of the most lengthy Bella Coola rituals and necessitates such a lavish expenditure of food that only a rich man can undertake it.

Accounts were obtained of the ritual as carried out by Qwaiilas of Tsawat and Sayaxis of Kimsquit, both of whom have the necessary prerogative. The details differ so slightly in the two localities that only one description need be given, and the dancer can be spoken of as X. The person of most Wintery dances is Sinaiilqwaiilis, Hyamsim, but that of Sainaiis is Kitkatla, a supernatural being remarkable for his wild and erratic behaviour.

When X has stored up so much food as he thinks necessary, he calls the marshals together to tell them of his desire to dance. In case of concern, they admonish him not to hurry matters but to perform the rite slowly and properly. Preliminary arrangements include the choosing of four kalaciw gifted with good memories to store up in their minds the poems made by the uninitiated. If many kalaciw are anxious to dance, X usually asks permission on the night of a correct remembering is essential. After this has gone on for some time, the singers strike up the tune of a song which they [533] have already composed for X.* The theme is always of the [171] god above and the wordless chorus, which is said to be the same for Mystery dancers all over the coast, is 'o'yaiwale.

The audience listen attentively so that they will be able to join in. When this has been sufficiently practised, a meal is served, amid the admonitions of the marshals. After a second practice of X's song, all is ready for a circuit of the village, the fact that it is about two or three o'clock in the morning being of no consequence.

X leads the party, followed by a considerable number of dancers, among whom must always be his four remembrancers.
They go to the lowest house of the village, which X enters, carrying his stick horizontally above his head, and proceeds with mincing steps to the central position behind the fire. He turns on himself and thrusts his staff to the floor where, to the surprise of the uninitiated, it remains upright.
They do not know that the end is pointed with bone and that X has taken care to drive it down into a crack. The singers start out X's song, in which all the kakaxiut join, but he does not dance. One of the singers next calls upon the people to beat time furiously with sticks brought for the purpose, and X becomes excited, shrieking out:

"Blow! Blow!"

It is supposed that this clamour soothes his mental anguish.
Herald calls on members of the household to register their dreams, uninitiated as well as kakaxiut being encouraged to do so. The remembrancers use their best efforts to bear in mind the answers which are pouring in. One of the marshals ex-that the whistle of Sxitsmâ-a is heard. The uninitiated, hearing the sound from the other houses, realize that the kindly being is approaching and are not surprised when a herald presently comes around to announce that X has recovered. In Kimsquit, X's frenzy slowly leaves him, and from this point onwards there are no differences in ritual between the two localities. The singers beat out a new song, prepared in readiness, of which the theme is Sxitsmâ-a, "The Restorer." X dances to it, and afterwards to any four of the numerous songs previously composed for him. Then he sits down, the first time he has done so, in public at any rate, since the beginning of the rite. Food is next distributed, the marshals make their usual remarks and the ksâxiat finally go to bed. From this point on, the ceremony follows the regular ksâxiat pattern; this occasion, when the riddles are solved, corresponds to kuxâmem. The successful guesser is dealt with as an initiate in the manner already described. Some of the uninitiated sitting near the youth often realize that he has been prompted by his father, but they regard this as a mere sign of solicitude, assuming that the parent's supernatural power enabled him to solve the problem. It seems clear to them that he could not have known the answer for any length of time because, like others, he had many times guessed and failed.

575* 796* [184] [533]

The next day is xwiatâlap. In the morning all the ksâxiat assemble in X's house to learn another new song; this corresponds to the second of a dance which lacks the long preliminaries of this one. A number of ksâxiat accompany X to the forest to get the necessary wood for the masks. Mystery dancers have the right to exhibit any, and as many, supernatural beings as they please, hence a large amount of wood must be brought back. In the evening comes the allotment of work. X may do it himself, but usually he asks his father, or some other elderly relative to act on his behalf. Since all his relatives contribute, the actual distribution of labour is not a task in which X alone is concerned. Sxa'kiwulnaix must be portrayed, and the three best carpenters are entrusted with though perhaps you cannot hear him because Wiwaina is making so much noise." 575* 996*

The meaning of this statement is difficult even to surmise and the Bella Coola themselves appear to be ignorant of it. It is said that the words are archaic. The ḱukuiat women at once begin to drone and the uninitiated flee, sometimes falling over one another in their eagerness to escape from the house, for the whistles are sounding and X has had his call. An eloquent ḱuciat stands beside him, apparently listening to him, and at intervals whets the curiosity of the audience by saying:

The person who appears to be listening is one who knows the story of Wiwaina and as soon as X has stopped, he proceeds to relate it to the audience,[30] as if he had just learnt it from the dancer. It is possible that even some of the ḱukuiat are deceived, but in any case they are so accustomed to acting that they practise it even when no uninitiated are present. The singers are especially attentive and presently begin to strike [548] out a new song composed for the occasion. The theme is of Wiwaina himself and his bird crew, and of the lazy Kimiliki; the audience listens eagerly and practises the composition. Afterwards food is distributed and admonitions of the marshals as is customary on the night of ḱuciaum.

Next morning a second song is practised for X, and then 575* a number of ḱukuiat go with him to the forest to bring in the 996* wood required for the ceremonial. In the evening members of 532 the society assemble in X's house for the allotment of carpentry tasks. The most important requirement is a canoe, shaped like a bird, and with bird figures as members of the crew. Considerable ingenuity is displayed in the manufacture of this; it is large enough to fill most of the rear part of the house, and, being bottomless, can be made to move by men concealed within. Several carpenters usually work together at this task. X also orders wooden replicas of the different for the dance to start, and X suddenly cries out that he is feeling peculiar. The night selected is usually that of the sakwam of some other dancer, and X is at once escorted to his own house from which the uninitiated are expelled. For that night and the two following he remains concealed within, leaving only when necessary and taking care that no uninitiated see him. During the afternoon following the third night of concealment, a large number of dancers gather in X's home and escort him to the lowest house of the village. He goes around the fire shaking a rattle violently and calling out:

"More! More! Please say exactly what you want and I will do it."

The uninitiated have been told that X has been unable to comprehend the impending call, hence they have no difficulty in realizing that this is a request to his supernatural patron to be more explicit.* This appeal is repeated in every house of the village in order from bottom to top. The rite is so important that X often summons dancers from neighbouring towns and, on the occasion described, the dancer proceeded to Sawd with his escort and there entered every dwelling with the same request that he had made in his own village.

In the evening X returns to his home where presently the dancers gather from the villages that he visited. The uninitiated from adjacent houses hear whistling as are not surprised when heralds enter to announce that a call has come to X. The ritual is of the regular Sanimow pattern and a song is composed and practised; the theme is of X's ability to visit the land above but the type is that of a shaman's song. The ritual concludes in the usual manner.

The next day, ceremonially, the customary ceremonial enclosure is erected and a number of dancers gather wood in the forest. In the evening the carpenters are requested to make a long ladder, the only paraphernalia required. The evening's ritual ends as usual.

*The person for this dance could not be known.

[The Dance of Thunder]

verbal to physical arguments, and one occasion is remembered when the latter was shoved from a canoe into the river.

In the evening the kukwisi are first called in, to be followed by the uninitiated in due course. Thunder dances in the manner already described, though, if possible, with even more vigour and abandon than when he was only one of the performers in the Mystery dance. As recorded in that dance, he performs twice, on the second occasion carrying a rattle containing burning shreds of cedar-bark. After each circuit of the central fire, Rainwater appears and drenches the audience, as rain accompanies a thunder-storm. The dramatic skill displayed is always impressive, and a touch of comic realism is added by the mirthful remarks of Tlogoit who does his utmost to belittle Thunder.

The time-beater for the expert dancers, Nisqlo, appears after Rainwater. When the ceremonial is carried out with care, he wears a skull mask to show that he is a ghost who has come from the land below in answer to the call of Mountainous. As he beats time he sings a wordless song of the dead. The skill of Nisqlo as a dancer is due to the fact that he is a yearling mountain goat among supernatural beings. The uninitiated look forward with eagerness to witnessing a remarkable dance, but after a few violent convulsions the performer withdrews, followed by the musician.

It would be needless repetition to enumerate all the supernatural beings who follow, so mention will be made only of those who are considered especially appropriate to the Thunder dance and who are accordingly shown on almost all occasions. Winter Wren is a masked figure which hops about in an agile manner similar to that of the bird on this earth, and Rabbit likewise imitates the movements of an earthly rabbit. Bad Medicine explains to the uninitiated that Thunder would like to eat the flesh of mortals but that he is too big and too hot to approach them, so sends Mosquito as his messenger. The masked figure representing that insect carries a stick about one foot in length beneath his blanket, and runs around the house

the uninitiated are expelled. If several kukusiut in the same village are prodigals of Thunder, each makes a circuit independently, but they agree to meet afterwards in the house of one of their number. Here all members of the society assemble for a meal provided hurriedly by X, or to a number of meals if several have Thunder as patron in this case there is no pooling of food. The marshals take the opportunity of giving their customary admonitions, as if it were midwinter. Next the singers combine their ideas and beat out a new song of which the theme is Thunder who now rests; it is worded as if X were speaking and describing what his patron is doing. This song is sung and resung until at present have learnt both tune and words. If there are several kukusiut with Thunder as patron, a song is made for each and practised in the same manner. 575* 796* [533] [533]

When all is ready, one of the heralds calls in the uninitiated. Each song is sung to the accompaniment of beating sticks while a dancer performs. Instead of X, this is an old man or woman who has not had a vision for many years. Often the dancer selected is so old that her she can dance only with the support of a stick; no reason could be learnt for this surprising deviation from the usual procedure. If several songs have been composed, a new dancer performs to each. After the last dance the uninitiated are expelled and the kukusiut soon follow. Since no call has come, it follows that it is of a ceremonial, though not of a sacred nature, and do not take the regular course of winter dances. It is said to "make good the path of Thunder," the term employed being identical with that used for the dance on subsequent after the burning of the masks. [787]

Nothing more need be published about the Thunder dance, except to give the following origin myth: 575* 796*

Long ago, long before the white man came to this land, but still longer after the first settlement, four brothers left Kimsquit to hunt mountain goats on Mount Pragoldin, near the Kimsquit River.* It was September, 539 821

*This mountain is the known as Long-back Salmon Mountain; its shape resembles the fish in question and it is said that long ago, in the very beginning of time, a salmon became petrified there. [109]

[The Ghost Dance]

*575 leave their bedrooms, but peer curiously and fearfully around
*796 the edge of the boards. Finally the party returns to X's house, whence the uninitiated hear the sound of sticks being beaten in a frenzied manner, but without the usual rhythmic conclusion. Each ḵuxiut beats as he likes, because it is an affair [775] of the dead with whom all things are queer and unnatural.

*575 The ghosts wash and take their places in X's house where *796 the singers are working on a new song. The words, as if spoken
775 by the dancer, describe the land of the dead; how everything
533 is green there; how the river flows from west to east so that the sun travels upstream; how the shades wished to make him a chief, and deceived him by not giving proper presents; how he visited the various towns scattered along the river, finding the bone in one of the houses; and finally how the dead told him of any mistakes in ritual that had been committed in the Bella Coola villages, in Kimsquit, or in Tāl·ēs. This last is, of course, common knowledge, but the Ghost dance is the only ḵuxiut ceremonial in which such information is used in the text of a song. Details are given, but the wording is so ambiguous that when the uninitiated later hear the song they do not comprehend its meaning. Since the ḵuxiut have concealed the error referred to, the necessity for veiled allusions is apparent. Everything connected with the Ghost dance is carried out in the reverse order; thus, the reference of X to presents which he did not receive is merely an intimation that he will presently bestow gifts on the singers and the other ḵuxiut who have assisted him. The wordless chorus of the tune consists of [171] 'aiye'aiyeaia, a phrase said to be the same for Ghost dances among all the coastal tribes. The singers practise this song while the audience listens attentively; then it is sung vigorously by all, while X dances. His style differs from that of all
*575 other ḵuxiut; first one arm and then the other is kept ex-
*796 tended, downwards, at an angle in front of the body with the 535 forefinger pointing to the ground. This method of dancing is 424 the prerogative of all Ghost dancers and provides a variation to the somewhat monotonous performances on different gallery.

qutlem. When the dance has ended, X gives presents; first to each spectator, and then to those who have assisted him, starting with the singers. This is the last event of the evening and the kukuxiut disperse. 575* 796* [431]

The factor of doing things in the reverse order appears not only in actions, but in the order of the ceremonies. Those just described, although at the beginning of the rite, resemble a nulaxaw in many respects. Consequently, it is not surprising that the next night is qutlem. The singers are the first to assemble and they compose a second song for X, with the same theme but different words and tune to that already prepared. Meanwhile the kukuxiut are gathering and when they have learnt the new song, the uninitiated are summoned. No enclosure has been built, and X is much in evidence. His body has been painted green with a preparation of grass rubbed in water, he wears the usual collar of dyed cedar-bark and a kind of head-dress with a triangular projection over his forehead. His two songs are sung, and X dances vigorously to each in the manner just described. This is followed by the customary qutlem ritual, kuxiut after kuxiut dancing as the singers beat out his two songs. Finally a Cannibal begins to growl fiercely in one of the rear corners and the uninitiated flee horrindly. The kukuxiut cut together, listening to the admonitions and remarks of the marshals, and then X dances once more. Among the peculiarities of the Ghost dance is the fact that the call may be returned at this point, or X may again become mad, according to the wishes of the marshals. If they desire a further display of his insanity, he rushes out as soon as he has finished dancing and proceeds to the lowest house of the village. A number of kukuxiut follow him and appear to be trying to prevent him from picking up handfuls of dirt from the floor and throwing them in all directions in an aimless manner. As a matter of fact his guardians take care that X heals approximately the same amount in each house, as none of them is willing to have more damage done in his own house than in others. After a visit to each dwelling, the party returns to

[The Ghost Dance]

*575 *796 [787] X's, where he is soothed by the four times repeated frenzied beating of sticks and his call returned whence it came.

During the rest of the ceremonial season X becomes mad at intervals and displays his insanity by rushing to every house and throwing dirt and sand. His kukuiat escort is always with him, and the procedure is identical with that already [424] recorded. X makes no recompense for the damage inflicted, so it is probable that his fellows do not regard his dance as an unmitigated pleasure, but nothing can be done to deter him from exercising his prerogative.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CHARMER

*575 *796 796 [522] [881] Although the Bella Coola are probably as moral as members of any other tribe, they enjoy humour of an obscene nature, and a dance which never fails to provide amusement is that of the Supernatural Charmer. The person of this is Sainsainmuk, a beautiful, unmarried, feminine being who is also termed Alipuin i and Nuuhmilaic. She is thought to disregard the efforts of her supernatural relatives to restrain her, and comes to this earth where she bestows her favours not only on human beings, but on animals. Her prototype at Kimsquit is a young [551] man, Kilaiuk, at Bella Coola, a young woman, Kualitmo; [562] like all other kwiat names these can be used either by men or [424] women. It is said that Kilaiuk's prerogative is derived from the experience of an ancestor in past ages, whereas that of Kualitmo was initiated three generations ago by a very powerful chief. The ritual in each case is identical, so the dancer [538] can be referred to as X. Each has the prerogative of singing [532] not only of Sainsainmuk, but also of the being known as Wiuuinmuk. Many masks are required at the rehearsal of either of these beings, as it is customary for X to perform with respect to Sainsainmuk one year, and to Wiuuinmuk at the next or a subsequent ceremonial season, though the actual songs always refer to both persons.

the gulow of another dancer. Next night the call comes to him in the ordinary manner, and the heralds go through the village announcing what has taken place. The uninitiated are expelled at once from X's house and the tsalaxiat presently assemble to listen to the song being composed by the singers. The theme is of Tsimsimdi; how she came down from above and travelled all over the world shamelessly luring men and animals; how various supernatural beings tried to restrain her without success; how she went to the house of Spil and was trying to seduce several young men living there when Wiwaiwaxwat appeared and endeavoured to make her behave herself, but without avail. The song then describes Wiwaiwaxwat who seems to be a warm wind, engaged in a never-ending duel with the cold winds.* No detailed description is required for the ritual of xaxaxalaqa, when a second song with the same theme is composed, or of gulow, since these follow the typical tsalaxiat pattern.

During the afternoon of xaxaxum, the tsalaxiat gather in X's house to try on the completed masks and make the final arrangements. Whistles sound so continuously that the uninitiated remain either within their own homes or near them, ready to hide in the bedrooms if necessary. Within X's house the carpenters are supervising the choice of masks; a dance man who is to speak like a woman is, as usual, chosen to represent Ana'lilwalaxa; another with similar qualifications is selected for Tsimsimdi, while the other masks can be worn by almost anyone. Presently a strange procession leaves X's house and enters the lowest house of the village where the uninitiated leaves into the inner rooms, but watch proceedings through cracks between the boards. First comes X himself, his face blackened and wearing the usual collar. He remains standing near the door and watches as Tsimsimdi enters and slowly proceeds around the central fire; she wears a mask representing a young and beautiful woman. Behind her come her lovers,

*Definite information concerning the identification of Wiwaiwaxwat could not be obtained.

[The Power of the Supernatural Charmer] ever since. Pity for strangers is not a strong Bella Coola 575* sentiment and the audience laughs heartily at the spectacle 796* of the doddering old man in vain pursuit of a heartless woman who is forever young. A considerable number of Sekwat [522] always accompany the procession, pushing their way out with [609] Ax'ilkwalaxic and Sisqiutl. Several of these carry whistles [152] concealed beneath their arm-pits and the noise of these serves to maintain the dignity of the occasion.

So many masked figures are used that all cannot accompany Sisnaxwmal into each house. Those unable to do so remain on the sidewalk outside, holding one of her lovers, a live mole mountain goat. At the next house another group of the charmer's victims enters and the ceremonial just described is repeated. The same is carried out at every dwelling in the village. Sisnaxwmal and her followers stop a few minutes in X's house before starting out on a second round, in which the same ritual is carried out. This is done twice more, so that each house is visited four times.

By this time dusk has fallen and all the Sekwat except those acting as escort to X have gathered in his house. Presently the uninitiated are called in. Sisnaxwmal is standing on a low box behind the fire, encouraging her masked lovers to come to her, and bestowing her affections indiscriminately in a heartless manner. The crush shows each other to endure realistically and though blows are not actually exchanged, great care must be taken to prevent masks from falling in the [522] crush occasioned. The efforts of the unfortunate Sisqiutl to reach his desire are always a source of merriment. Ax'ilkwalaxic as usual explains the significance of it all. Sometimes a cradle is brought in, over which Sisnaxwmal croons while a [533] ● song is sung, describing her as the mother of many creatures of whom the fathers are animals. It is uncertain whether this part of the ceremony takes place before or after the show fight or, indeed, whether it is not another type of subscene which X can use as well. The ritual concludes in the normal way with the expulsion of the uninitiated, the dancing of Ax'ilkwalaxic, *5715 *796 the burning of the masks, the dancing of X, and the return of his call.

During a later season when a call comes to X, the ritual deals with Wiwintmak, but only the outline of the ceremony could be learnt. The theme of the two songs composed for the [533] occasion is of Wiwintmak and how he fights with his enemies, the cold winds. His only weapons are fierce roaring and a belligerent expression, but these suffice to keep his adversaries at a distance, especially his principal foeman, the evil wind, Nacskápes.

There is no deviation from the usual type of kuciut ceremonial until the day of nakazaw when a fight takes place at the river's edge where all, including the uninitiated, can see it. The kukuciut of the village are divided into two parties, of which one comes from upstream, the other from below, meeting in front of X's house. The leaderless combatants shove each other two and fro, without actually coming to blows. Wiwintmak remains behind one party, encouraging his warriors by his roars, while Nacskápes spurs on his supporters by valiant gestures, without daring to come too near the combat. Wiwintmak's followers finally win the day and drive back the other party. Ano'kitmolnaie is much in evidence, explaining to the uninitiated, who cower in the shelter of the houses, that this is the way in which the winds fight in the land above. That evening non-members are called to X's house where they witness a combat of the same type. The ceremonial concludes in the usual manner.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL LOVER

[524] Another kuciut ceremonial which closely resembles that just described is the prerogative of a young Bella Coola woman named Qwa'nak' who inherited it from her mother's mother's sister's son. It will be convenient to refer to her as X.

When X wishes to dance, she first obtains the consent of the marshals in the normal manner and chooses a convenient [533] day for the coming of her call. Then the kukuciut gather in her house while the singers compose a new song. The theme is of her patron, the young male being, Kwat ĉwal a, "The Big One." It describes how he came from above and went far and near over the earth in lustful pursuit of women, how each victim fell in love with her seducer so that she followed him in all his wanderings, how Loon befriended him, and how he exchanged his blanket for a covering of abalone-shells. 575* 796* 538 776

On wacnatâlap when the kukwiat as usual go to the forest, they bring back not only wood for masks but also the trunk of a large cedar tree, at which the carpenters work during the two succeeding days. On nakwam a parade occurs of the supernatural beings similar to that in the dance of the Supernatural Charmer, but the masked figures represent women, not men, of the different coastal tribes. Kwat ĉwal a leads the procession and pays no more attention to his mistresses than did Xwmoĉmult to her would-be lovers. There is the same lurking for lewd remarks, of which Kwat ĉwal a takes full advantage when he calls the attention of the young men to his following, and asks them how many mistresses each has had. 592 931 322

In the evening the uninitiated are called to X's house where the first object they see is the tree-trunk, converted by the carpenters into an enormous bird. Wooden wings and a loon's head have been provided and the whole is painted in imitation of a loon's plumage. Kwat ĉwal a is in evidence, wearing a bird disguise. Presently a matting enclosure in one of the rear corners of the house is thrown open, and the uninitiated see the throng of the mistresses who rush forth, almost coming to blows in their eagerness to reach their seducer. Awithkwalaxis stands on one side and explains the significance. After the mock combat has lasted for a few minutes, a Cannibal begins to growl and the uninitiated hurry out. The ceremonial then concludes in the usual manner. 532

This dance differs from all other kwiat rites in one respect, since the call can come to X several times during a single ceremonial season. Of course there is no compulsion; she uses her own discretion as to whether she dances more than once, 424

[575] but a proud and energetic dancer sometimes repeats a cere-[796] mony three or four times.
[424]

THE SUN DANCE[*]

[776] One of the forms in which Alquaxiów appears is that of the [191] Sun, and in that case he is referred to as Sawáiletlo. Considering the importance of this deity, it is rather surprising that the kwáiat dance of which he is patron is not more impressive.
Efforts were made to obtain full details of the ceremonial from several informants, but only a number of incidents and a bare [124] outline could be obtained. In part this was due to the fact that none of the informants[*] were themselves protégés of Alquaxiów, but this is not in itself sufficient to explain the comparative unimportance of the dance, since full accounts were obtained of other rituals from those who did not own them.

Nothing was learnt of the origin of any of the Sun dance [424] prerogatives, except that ancestors of the owners obtained them [551] from Alquaxiów. It is a common right, and kakaciat having Alquaxiów as patron are found in every village, among them being Qwaláx-i of Tiemsit, and Nuxmatiwalais of Nuxqalit. As far as could be ascertained, the ritual of various Sun dance performances is identical, so one account will suffice and the dancer can be termed X.

Like other kwáiat dancers, X can perform at any time during the ceremonial season, subject to the approval of the marshals.
The call comes to him in the normal manner, the uninitiated are expelled, and the kakaciat gather in his house to practise the songs which the singers have just composed. The theme [533] is of Alquaxiów, describing his manifold functions, and partic-[776] larly that of guiding the Sun. The following day a second song with similar theme is composed, and in the evening the masks are allotted for the manufacture of masks. Four are re-[532] quired; a large one representing Alquaxiów himself, one of [191]

dance of Nuákmum is omitted owing to the large expenditure required, X must sing, without a call, in conjunction with the Wú·a dancer. In this case also the details are lacking.

Likewise at the winter solstice, when the carrying Ilqawiów at last enters Nuxpelcumíte to greet the waiting supernatural ówáciat, it is incumbent on his protégé to perform in his honour below. The singers are always ready with a new song for the occasion, and in the evening his fellows assemble in his house to learn it. X wears the usual ceremonial collar, but he lacks the awe-inspiring qualities of a ówáciat who has had a call. When the song has been sufficiently practised, the uninitiated are brought in to listen to it and to watch the dancing of X. At the conclusion of the performance they are given a little food, provided by X, which they carry away while the ówáciat remain to eat at their ease and listen to the admonitions of the marshals. It is probable that the ritual carried out at the beginning of the ceremonial season is identical with the above. One old man stated that long ago it was customary to dance in the same manner at the summer solstice; this might be expected, but confirmation was unobtainable.

Like the protégé of Thunder, X is sometimes called upon to perform during the non-ceremonial season. But whereas a Thunder dancer acts when his patron is apparent by peals of sound, X must do so when his patron is invisible through an eclipse.* The ritual is almost identical with that already described for a Thunder dancer so nothing but additional details need be inserted. X visits every house shaking a rattle, which is not the case with Thunder dancers. After his circuit of the village, the ówáciat gather in his house where the singers are composing a new song describing the phenomenon. The words explain that Eclipse, the supernatural being Nujely', has blocked or destroyed the path of the Sun, and add how disastrous it would be if the Sun could not recover its way. Later on, the uninitiated are called in to watch X's dance which, like

*The Bella Coola term both for "eclipse" and the being responsible is Nujely' which also means "A Fire That Has Died Out."

This ceremony is an example of the great diversity in kusiut dances. Instead of the usual patron in the land above, the slave woman is considered to be definitely located on this earth, at a spot near Stax. Moreover, the call comes through her actual appearance. The writer would have liked to learn further details of the dance, but they were unobtainable. 575* 796*

THE DANCE OF THE OTTER

Since every Bella Coola has, at the present time, some sort of kusiut dance, it would have been possible to collect the details of a large number. Only the main outlines of the dances which follow were obtained, but it is hoped that the complexity of those already described will suffice to explain the scope of the kusiut society. In some cases the details were omitted to save time, in other cases the informant was ignorant of them. The latter reason is responsible for the sketchiness of the Otter dance. [424]

This ritual is the prerogative of a Snulili kusiut, Xwodjw·i, "The Crash," a name which refers to the din when the first Sasq' collapsed in the beginning of time. Presumably one of Xwodjw·i's ancestors was present at the fall and chose the name in consequence. The dancer's patron is the land otter, but the connection between this animal and the name has been forgotten, as the father of the performer frankly admitted. He suggested that probably one of his ancestors remembered having seen an otter before coming to this world, and chose it as patron for a dance which he instituted with respect to the name Xwodjw·i. It will be convenient to refer to the dancer as X. 575* 796* 424 551

X can perform at any convenient period during the ceremonial season. When the call comes, the ritual of the first three days follows normally, except that the songs used are supposed to have been unaltered. Before nakusam the carpenters prepare a dummy otter, using a skin stretched over a wooden framework. A long rope is fastened to this and the figure thrown into the water so that it sways to and fro 575* 796* [593] preferably skilled carpenters. Heralds visit every house in the village informing all that X has gone to meet, or to wait for, Dark-Shade. 575* 796*

[The Dance of the Dark-Shade]

Meanwhile X and his companions are utilizing the last hours of daylight in collecting a large quantity of gum. They build a fire, and by its flickering light the dancer is coated with gum so carefully that even his teeth and nails are invisible; in this disguise he represents Dark-Shade. Early the following morning the singers and those kukusiut who have already danced during the current season set off on lashed canoes to meet X and his party whom they take on board. Waiting till the tide is favourable, the canoes are slowly poled up the river. As they come in sight of the village, the singers strike up some well-known tune, and in time to it everyone on the platform between the canoes begins to dance, each using the style proper to his prerogative. It is an animated scene. The uninitiated watch the approach, and gaze with wonder upon the strange dark figure; it is all so uncanny that they need little urging from the kukusiut to withdraw to their houses, where they peer curiously through chinks in the walls. Members of the society line the river bank and, as Dark-Shade draws near, one after another cries out that a call has come to him. The marshals have previously decided who shall dance at this time and informed those selected; sometimes it is a kusiut who has already performed once during the season, or it may be a person who has not performed for many years. [535] [424] 575* 796* 787

All the kukusiut accompany Dark-Shade and her escort to X's house from which all uninitiated have long been expelled. The singers compose a new song of which the words are arranged as if Dark-Shade, not X, were speaking. The theme of one, used a number of years ago, is: 575* 796* [533]

"Let X fetch me to visit mortals."

Unfortunately, the details of X's dance were unavailable. Dark-Shade herself remains for four days hidden within X's house, though he attends the ceremonies of other kukusiut and his presence there on the nights of qatlaw and nakazaw is a source of awe to the uninitiated, who marvel that a man can still appear like an ordinary mortal when he has just brought a supernatural visitor home. According to one informant who, however, is not well versed on Sacrier matters, there is neither guilds nor subcrests, and Dark-Shade is merely seen every other four days. This may be the case, but the dance has not been carried out for many years, and the man frankly admitted that he did not know the details. It seems more likely that there is some kind of ceremony, since a song would not be composed unless for a definite purpose.

The coming of Dark-Shade complicates the Sacrier ceremonial since a number of dancers receive their calls simultaneously. In this case the ritual is carried out in unison which requires, for example, the composition of one song for each performer on Sacrierm. Calls never come in this way to dancers with important or complicated prerogatives, but it is a useful means of dealing with those whose right is merely to sing of their patrons. On subcrests the patrons of all are displayed, a method which has the advantage of producing a dramatic effect which would be lacking if only one were in evidence. The coming of a call by means of Dark-Shade is called tsilendinat, "Emerging from Below to Plain Sight." Another time when several calls may come simultaneously to different Sacrier is at the winter solstice when, on the story of Alpamim, the supernatural beings rush forth and some of them fall, causing calls to come to their human prodigals.

THE DANCE OF THE YOUNG MAN

Y'yulmqf, the man who was petrified with his Owen Lake wife and four children at the beginning of time, is patron for a Kimsquit Sacrier man named Kmcin. His repository is just above high-water mark on the east side of Dean Channel, about five miles from its head, and about one hundred and fifty feet north of the legal fishing boundary. This is almost immediately opposite Y'yulmqf's station. The repository is beneath the ground, and its doorway is a beaver which became Whitefeind usually remains in the land above but sometimes visits the earth. He is person for a factor who displays a mask representing him in characteristic form, the design of which is said never to vary. [775] [776] [776] [621] [532]

THE DOKEBO OF THE EARTHQUAKE

The Bella Coola believe that an earthquake is caused by the earth slipping very slightly from the grasp of Sisiutl. This being is person for certain factors and whenever a tremor occurs, his prestigic call their ancestors and a dance is held. This may, of course, be at any season, and the ritual during spring or summer is identical with that described for dances whose patrons are Thunder, the Sun, or the Moon. The theme of the song is of the manner in which Sisiutl performs his function of holding the world. A call from Sisiutl may also come in the normal manner to one of his prestigic during the ceremonial season, but the ritual is of the usual type and merits no special description. In Kimsquit, Sisiutl is person to a factor named Hilhulaulem. [228] [339] [331]

THE DOKEBO OF THE SEASONS

The height to which the tides shall rise is decided by a male supernatural being, Mentlen-mem, "Tide-Measurer." He is person of a factor named Tsil, whose repository is near Bella Coola. One of Tsil's ancestors brought the rice with him from above to the beginning of time. The songs used at the dances describing how Tide-Measurer uses a stick in deciding how far the waters shall rise. During the day of rahrawa the ancestral souls are said to go to their houses but, by peering round the corners and through chinks, as they always do, they are able to see a masked figure walk into the room, and throw down on the hearth a stick which he carries. This is repeated four times during the day. [225] [551] [776] [533] and one was held up by the low parapet so the craft neared the shore to protect him and those behind from arrows and stones cast by slings. When not in use, double eyes laid away in boxes with some white substance resembling flour.[1] On the shore of the fort below Bella Coola, opposite Winter Bay, there are some boulders of the same white tuff, even now there are often spoken of as "The Middle of the Bella Coola." It is said that hostile visitors, seeing them, used to remark that they had reached the purpose of Bella Coola.

The same lack of leadership shown during preparations for a war was evident during hostilities. The so-called leader had little authority over his men, who could desert and return home at any time. Lack of martial ability among their own chiefs sometimes led the Bella Coola to place themselves under the authority of a Bella Bella in a way which would be impossible for a war-like people. Frequently such divided leadership led to disaster, and is the surest proof that the Bella Coola were not as aggressive or bellicose as other coastal tribes.

Except when attacking the Cactzas, all visiting parties embarked to canoes and followed a definite order of procedure handed down from the past. In the stern of each craft sat the captain, a chief, who, as the craft was leaving, began to sing his so-do song, keeping time to it with the beats of his paddle, the measuring of the glottal of their ancestors was supposed to encourage the warriors. Instead of having simultaneously, a rendezvous was often chosen down the fiord, and the expedition finally moved off from there when all the canoes had arrived. While still in friendly territory, a hostile procedure equally. A small amount of dried salmon and water was carried by a war party and morsels of the former were eaten at intervals. The low-class rank as much food and drink as he thought could be consumed at one sitting, put a fragment of dried salmon in his mouth, chewed it four times on the same side of his mouth as he was paddling, and swallowed it. This [illegible] while in sleep. Meanwhile, their wives at home were required to be very careful, since a woman's heedless playing would cause injury to her husband, and furthermore, his death. These restrictions were obligatory during the absence of the expedition.

[illegible] As the party neared the enemy's country, they would conceal the craft under projecting rocks by day and travel only at night. When within striking distance, a scouting canoe was sent forward to learn the hostile dispositions, the best means of approach, and so forth. This was usually done at dusk, and when the scouts had returned, the party would land quietly through the forest and hide behind the unsuspecting village. At dawn the leader would give the signal, and the attackers would rush forward with a fierce shout, killing all the men and [illegible] taking women and children as slaves. When captives were taken by slave members of the expedition, they belonged to the leader's masters. The victors would cut off the heads of their victims, and when last they could, set fire to the village and rush home before support could arrive from neighboring towns. At first, the daughter was usually a somewhat unpleasant task, but as the warriors became inflamed with the lust of battle, they began to delight in killing, and even women and children frequently suffered.

[illegible] The returning victors spent honeymoons, rejoicing at their success but somewhat fearful that they might be cut off by overwhelming reinforcements. During the journey, each warrior who had taken a head removed the scalp by cutting the skin around the wrinkle that shows the collarbone and neck. These trophies were washed in the rock Chakwenamin on the head below Bella Coola. When within sight of home, the captain stood up in the canoe and sang again his war song, a symbol of victory as the bloody scalps were held aloft. Women and children would rush forth to greet the conquerors who headed said scene of wild enthusiasm and rejoicing.

[illegible] Prisoners of war became the property of those who had taken them, with the exception of those captured by slaves.

Bowen instructed them to carry him home very carefully. On reaching the hamlet, all their fellow-villagers came crowding around, and when they learnt of their chief's injury, they loudly expressed their sympathy. Bowen continued his groanings, and when he had been taken to his home, one of the neighbours began to sponge away the blood. Much to his surprise, he could find no wound; then, looking more carefully, he recognized that the "blood" was only berry-juice. He proclaimed his discovery in a loud voice, and everyone laughed at Bowen, who sought deserving his misery.

Presently he reached the Wolf village, where a dance and feast were in progress in the chief's house. Dzoo was invited inside, and the chief asked him if he could dance.

"Yes," said Dzoo. "I will show you my celebrated dance, but I must have sound shells tied to my legs."

When this was done, Dzoo began to dance, violently, and, as he went on, his dance left others, one by one, until only an old woman remained awake. Dzoo danced immediately in front of her until she too slumbered. Then he took off the sound shells and began to cut the throats of the Wolves with them. When about half-finished the old woman showed signs of waking so Dzoo hastily disembowelled his daughter in dance before her, and again she slept. All except a few had been killed when the old woman woke up and saw what was happening. She roused the others with a cry:

"Wake up! Wake up! Our vision is murdering us."

Dzoo had cut the wounds with Wolves in pieces. They pressed him so closely that he slashed a rope, a line which Dzoo could go to Dzoo dove, but Wolves could not. The pursuers returned to their house and asked the old woman what they ought to do. She told them they must have a song, which, when sung in the face of the rope to which Dzoo had taken refuge, would cause him to fall down. So they sat down and she taught them the following words:[3]

Yaaskamlaxa	yaaskamqaqa	skaklkyakaq	skaklaxa-yaqka

THE BELLA COOLA INDIANS

THE MAIN STORY

[illegible]

Perhaps a hundred years after the first people came down to earth, there remained in Thunder a woman, called [illegible]. She was old, so old that she did not let her face hang in great folds, which her forears and body consisted of a mass of bodies like wrinkles of extreme ugliness. She was so old that she appeared hardly human, more like a shell than a woman. Apparently, by her supernatural power, had kept her alive long after her normal span of life had been completed. One day she said to him:

"I want to go down to earth to pay a visit to my friends there."

Apparently agreed, and caused so many trail to appear which led her to the bank of the Dean River, opposite a village. She called out and two brothers who heard her brought her across to their canoe to the middle, where they entertained her in their house. Then they sent word to all their friends to come and see the strange human hag which they had found, this being the first time that the people had ever seen anybody of the kind.

Presently the two brothers were off to have necessary guests, leaving an home their sister, an adolescent girl, to entertain. Some visitors of these people were living in the house in the corners in the old days and [illegible] was given a place near the door. This evening a baby girl cried incessantly, the mother could not quiet her.

"Please give her to me," said [illegible], "I will put her to sleep."

The old woman took the crying child to her arms and crooned into her ear:

"[illegible]"
"[illegible]"

[illegible]

This is the kind of lullaby which mothers sing to their children as an [illegible] in anything when the hag fell asleep in the mother's lap. When no one was looking, she turned her mouth into an [illegible] and then killed the little one. Then she gave it back to its mother.

"Here is its body," she said. "The baby is asleep."

The mother obeyed, not knowing what the [illegible] old hag had done.

When night came all in the house went to sleep, except the young girl who lay awake, but silent in her corner. Presently she saw the little [illegible] and lips of the old woman [illegible] into a hag, [illegible] with their earning ability and a man can satisfy his wants by working for a few months each summer. The decline of commercial fish left a blank in their lives, one easily filled, also, with drinking, idleness, and vice. It is inevitable that the old ways and old authorities should pass, but the prohibition of these tribes now over had upon their place, has been disastrous. The Bella Coola have lost their pride, a calamity as fatal to a people as to an individual.

They have shown undoubted ability in developing each of their own tribes as to the needs and requirements of the white men. Expert carpenters for generations, they have readily learnt the use of new tools and now build houses and boats of considerable commercial skill. They have proved themselves valuable employees of the canneries which rely to a large extent upon Indian labour. Under instruction from a white teacher, a number of the younger men have formed a band which gives creditable performances with wind and percussion instruments. One can only deplore the fact that the skill of the Bella Coola in carving, painting, acting, singing, composing, and story-telling could not have been guided into channels where it would have developed and added honor to the new world in which they find themselves.

The white man's civilization passes forward in an ever-widening flood, blotting out the cultures of lower peoples in all parts of the world. This is inevitable, probably it is well that it should be so, but it offers little consolation to a tribe like the Bella Coola. Their life has been destroyed, and, unknowingly, half-proudly, half-pitiously, the survivors watch the downfall of all that their ancestors cherished. The white man fails to understand this, nor often he fails to realize that progress, as he sees it, is ripping out valuable elements of civilization other than his own instead of adding the good to them and preserving it for the benefit of himself and the native alike. The Bella Coola tribes is dying, and with it will pass forever something owned by a Canadian people, not great perhaps, but medially occupied with their possessor.

APPENDIX 9

STRING FIGURES

THE only form of pastime that is was practical to investigate in any detail was the construction of string figures. These seem to have no commercial or religious significance; they are made for recreation only, and it was found easy to learn number while passing the way for other kinds of research. In fact, some to them was one of the ways in which the series became known with number of Bella Coola. As is to be expected, some individuals showed proficiency in constructing complicated string figures from others, the old women being particularly adept. Among the long stories which one to all the dances is a common right to see an old woman teaching a group of young girls the figures which she herself learnt when young. She must remember a number from childhood, for the making of designs with string is regarded as more fitting for girls and women. Songs accompany many of the figures, and the singing of them is considered an accompaniment of the construction. It was found that many more figures were from long ago; in fact, several of these have recently been only obtained by repeated efforts on the part of an old woman to remember those she had been shown when a child. No attempt has made to learn all a Bella Coola figures; a larger number could doubtless have been collected, but those here described are the most commonly made.

The nomenclature used is as described by Miss Haddon,[1] in each following the method used by Jones and Haddon. It will be assumed that the reader is familiar with the meaning of the terms, "Opening 1," "Position 1," and "Transfer." A string always has two long and its thumb main connections making the Bella Coola figures.

1. [illegible]

Double the loop, the crossbrace take the place of the usual one, but these will be referred to as a new string or loop. The figure can be made equally well with a string twice the usual length.

Place string on a single forearm left thumb and index finger and the right hand.

It is especially rich in caribou-skins, used for foot covering, and goat-skins, so treasured for their wool.[1] He and his wife have laid up abundant food, and, most important of all, his wife's family is wealthy. Rumours have spread that X will soon give a potlatch and perhaps one or more foreign chiefs has given him a large cone-shaped whistle, such as is used in cannibal ritual (see Plate 11). These whistles, called gmo-o, are often referred to as the "breath" or "voice" of a chief; they are also called skpxoa, the "heart" or "wind" of a chief; a third designation is nalaiwat. X carefully conceals a whistle in one of his boxes. Such a present expresses the kindly feeling existing between those akin to one another in that they have risen to a position of eminence above the common crowd. Its receipt spurs a man to greater efforts to amass the wealth necessary for giving a potlatch by keeping before his eyes the realization of what another has done. A rival chief never gives such a present. X returns each whistle secretly at the time of his potlatch.

Early in the autumn X decides that he has almost enough wealth. To complete the essential amount he will not hesitate to borrow from his friends. It is most unusual to be refused, for it is incumbent on X, unless he wishes to lose the esteem of the community, to repay his borrowings with heavy interest, and when X distributes his goods at his potlatch it will be announced how he has obtained them, and the lender is proclaimed as a person of sufficient wealth to be able to spare some of it. Goods so loaned are termed "belt goods," a reference to the manner in which a man fastens up his cape with a belt before setting to work. The assumption is that X will have to labour to repay his indebtedness. Failure to repay is a serious matter, and the lender would be justified in seizing a canoe or other valuable article as surety for his debt; in fact, feuds are commonly caused by unpaid debts. Men of business

[1] Formerly, when goat-skin blankets were highly valued, goats were never shot for fear of the blood staining the wool. Instead, they were cornered by dogs, and choked to death in nooses. For presentation, each skin was laid out on the floor and then cut into longitudinal strips, two, three, or four fingers wide.

of his village, hence they will not feel it incumbent upon them to intervene. But news travels, and in course of time the armed members of some other tribe will decide to send a raiding party against X's village. All informants agreed most emphatically that this custom prevailed among the coast people from the Tsimshian country to Alert Bay, but specific examples could not be obtained. The Bella Coola regard such a raid as the proper course to pursue, and belligerent tribes may have used an irregularity in the potlatch rites as an excuse for an assault. It is clear, however, that this custom never attained such prominence that it could be called a law.

The father of an informant had had such success in giving potlatches that his neighbours were jealous. On one occasion he prepared a representation of a whale, an elaborate wooden frame, fifteen feet long, operated by men concealed within and carrying paddles; this was a figure which entered into his ancestral myth. One of the carpenters who made it, bribed by a jealous rival of the donor of the potlatch, arranged that the lower jaw of the whale should fall to the floor during the proceedings. This revealed the mechanism of the structure. White influence on the coast prevented an incursion of foreign raiders, but according to this informant, the chiefs determined that his father should die, and they employed a sorcerer for this purpose. His father and eleven other relatives died soon afterwards. This man, the sole survivor, ascribes his escape to his adoption of Christianity.

Another instance of the penalty which follows errors in potlatch ritual occurred a few years ago, when a number of young men used the cone-shaped whistles openly, as if they had been toys. The presence of the white man prevented any open steps towards punishment, but before long all the youths died. No one knows what caused their deaths, though probably they were due to an expert in black magic acting on the instructions of a senior ninak.

After the prayer, X and his family give more food to their guests, whose boxes containing what they are to carry away are increasing in number. By his lavishness, X increases his prestige in the eyes of his fellow-villagers.

If he can afford to build a new house embodying the form

242 whiskers over which is scattered eagle down. From the back 535 of the head-dress hang wound skins. In Bella Bella it is said to be customary for a skin to be added on every occasion when a * 556 guest is confined to the back-room. This may happen as many 575 as fifteen times to the child of wealthy parents, and a few Bella
Coola have adopted the practice of marking each with a skin.
[237] Usually, some six or nine are hung in two rows, without consideration of the number of times the wearer has been in seclusion. The central figure of the forehead mask is a head with [532] a hooked nose, the crescent hook being joined to the face itself. This figure does not vary with the wearer's ancestral myth, and no one knows what it represents. This design is [177] said to have been introduced to Bella Coola from the north a few generations ago; before that time the head-dress consisted [237] of a circular band of dyed cedar-bark, decorated with the tail [824] feathers of one of the large woodpeckers. The Bella Coola call it simply, "forehead mask." Each initiate carries a hollow [532] rattle, carved in the shape of a bird, which he holds in his right
• [534] hand, belly uppermost. Long, long ago, when a dancer failed to do so, the rattle became alive and the bird flew away; hence, this rule has been obeyed ever since.

535 Each initiate takes up his station in some part of the house
* 556 behind the fire and dances to the beating of the sticks. The 575 left hand of each is clasped behind his back and in his right he holds the rattle and keeps it in constant motion by shaking his wrist. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a good dancer.
Keeping the body stiff and the legs close together, he rises with slight jumps, barely altering his position on the floor. Sometimes he slowly turns around sunwise[1] in his series of jumps, at other times he does not alter his position. The head is bent from side to side and downwards at each jump, causing the eagle down to fly in all directions. Sixsed assistants blow more of the material on to the head-dress at intervals (see Plate 16).[1/4]

[821] [1]The Bella Coola believe that the sun moves from east to south to west to [796] north. Many ceremonial movements follow this direction, which will henceforth be described as sunwise.

[1/4] [See cat 116, facing p 219 - ANALYST]

the same manner the Raven speaker outlines a myth belonging to the ancestral family of X's mother, again with emphasis on the dances used by her ancestors. X, as a member of both ancestral families, can combine his rights from both sides, but it is customary for him to use no more than five or six performances. Should X have no claim to this privilege from either mother or father, an almost unthinkable situation, he is able to borrow the prerogative of using some from friends. The ancestors on which this section of myths is based is the one so often mentioned; it marks the close relationship between the future children and their noble ancestors of old, a source of strength to the former.

X's father now names those whom he wishes to assist him on the following day. These are the dancers, who are chosen primarily for their skill in dancing, and secondarily in accordance with their rank. With them he selects a number of persons to stand near and help or "cherish" them as they perform. He also asks the services of some of the women who are professional dancers; of the keeper of the marriage song of his ancestral family; and, finally, of a number of men to sit near the singers and assist them with suggestions. It would be most exceptional for anyone so called upon to decline the honour. It is near morning by this time and the guests depart.

On the following morning, the actual wedding day, X's father calls to his house those selected the previous evening as dancers and their assistants. The former wear blankets decorated with small copper ornaments* and carry circular wooden rattles provided with handles. Their clothing and rattles may be their own, but if they do not possess suitable attire, it is incumbent on X's father to provide them. Skins are piled up within the house, and some of these are said to "make soft the

*At the present time there is uncertainty as to the proper clothing of a marriage dancer. Several informants stated that it was a copper-decorated blanket, whereas others said that there was no special attire; one man claimed that an attempt was made to imitate the form and costume of X's first ancestor, and another that round costume was used. Probably there was no uniformity in custom.

*575 796 534 [77] are considered necessary. With few exceptions, hereafter to be noted, Sacred masks are burnt at the conclusion of each ceremony, a practice which probably originated in order to avoid the possibility of their being seen by the uninitiated. The Bella Coola state that this is one of the most striking differences between their rites and those of the Bella Bella.

*575 796 534 [237] Next in importance to masks are whistles (see Plate 1). The large, cone-shaped form used in sacred ceremonial is replaced in Sacred dances by a smaller type consisting of portions of wood glued together, which can be blown with ease from beneath a concealing blanket. Another type has bellows consisting of a mountain goat bladder, which is held beneath the armpit so that it can be worked invisibly. During the summer the whistles are kept by one individual, usually a Sacred. Specific information concerning the ownership of these whistles could not be obtained; it appears that any Sacred can make one, or have one made for him by a skilled craftsman, and that their retention by one person during the summer is merely for convenience. They are freely lent to anyone for use in a ceremony. [425] [426]

*575 796 534 [334] [124] In some dances special objects are used in connection with dramatic performances, such as bull-roarers, wooden representations of animals, birds, or miniature human beings. One old man described a pipe formerly used at Tal'ts, which had a carved bowl as large as a tea-cup with three radiating stems. It was carved from a knotty excrescence on a beech bole. Little could be learnt of its history, except that it was supposed to have been carved by a chief with the design of his patron and displayed through pride.

*575 609 796 [248] [123] The usual guests at a performance of the type just summarized are the dancer's fellow-villagers and any strangers who happen to be present in the town. Great as is the desire of the Sacred to impress their uninitiated tribesmen, they are still more eager to impress strangers, hence the presence of Carriers adds piquancy to the rites. The writer believes that his presence and interest encouraged the Bella Coola to some saliva which he puts into his mouth and chews. Of course he mentions only the saliva but X, unaware of this, is concerned for the loss of his spirit. At last it is restored to him and he is told that he sisi has altered it from that of an unnoticed person to that of a kwakiut.* The psychological effect of this act on the mind of a young man who has not had time to adjust himself to his new knowledge and who is firmly convinced of the power of the sisi is tremendous.

The four sisi reconstruct two kwakiut sitting on either side of X to lie down to serve as a seat for him. They do so, unaware of who they may be. If the novice is still ignorant of the full mysteries of the society, the sisi announces that he is going to get a call for X. He walks around the house, peering here and there as if seeking something, and then pounces as if he had caught an object between his hands. A whistle is heard, such as the novice knows accompanies the coming of every call; but he does not know that the noise is made by compressing a goat or bear bladder-whistle between two sticks held beneath the armpit. This is the "mystery" of the strange noises.

"Do you know what makes that noise?" ask the two kwakiut on whom X is sitting.

If X denies all knowledge, the mystery is explained to him, and he is warned that he will be killed if he communicates the information to uninitiated persons. If he answers that he knows the cause, he is asked who has told him. Perhaps some lad has been peeking and has told X of what he has seen; in that case the over-inquisitive youth is at once initiated to prevent further leakage of information. As soon as X has learnt the great secret he moves to one side and the singers take their positions behind the fire. His father, or whoever it may be from whom he is to obtain his name, then stands up and unfolds its origin, telling which supernatural being is his patron, and the locality of his repository. X sometimes reof he so desires. The kukuxiut listen to the song, and when it is 575* to among they join in. They practise it repeatedly, until 796* familiar with both words and tune. This part of the ceremony [333] lasts for about two hours. [292]

The singers, and any others who are prepared to beat time, [334] are always provided with long, flat, thin sounding-boards to increase the din of the pounding. When the swaitsis decide that the song is sufficiently familiar, they call some of the kukuxiut to carry these boards to the lowest house of the village. They do this, and also scatter clean sand on the floor, as is customary whenever a supernatural being is to enter. The uninitiated persons within the house watch with great interest. The singers enter and take their places behind the 575* fire, then other kukuxiut and finally X himself; his face is 796*
unblackened, but he wears his two eagle tails in his hair and 292 a collar of dyed cedar-bark. On his head is a thin cylindrical circlet, about four inches high, of the same material, ornamented with swan's down by the inhabitants of the villages of the upper Bella Coola valley. The collar consists of a roll of grass, entirely covered with dyed cedar-bark from which pendant tassels of the same hang down over his chest; similar ones are worn by nusk dancers, except that the tassels hang down their backs. Every kuxiut dancer wears these two ornaments, and those who have the necessary prerogative adorn [424] themselves with an apron of deer hooves or puffin beaks. [237]
Blankets are always worn. Kukuxiut women wear in addition woollen pubic garments.

As the singers beat out X's tune, accompanied by the 575* voices of themselves and other kukuxiut, he dances. Since his 796* style is typical of all kukuxiut except Cannibals and a few 535 others, it will be well to digress at this point in order to describe it. X raises his arms until their upper parts are approximately the height of his shoulders, and project outwards and slightly to the front; they are bent at the elbows with the forearms vertical, thus bringing the hands opposite the top of the head. Both wrists are shaken constantly, the muscles of the lower

[The Dance of Healing]

of his relatives, has given them for this purpose. When he 575*
crouches during the chorus they crowd close around, almost 796*
concealing him. Particularly in those dances fraught with danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his 535 friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely crouds up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. [543]
It is considered contrary to good manners for a father or a help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is pleased to have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bella Bella [171] certain kukasiut have definite prerogatives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bella Coola. Throughout every dance the kukasiut women utter their drooing cry. [539]

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in 575*
the lowest house see. They hear the song, too, and gaze with 796*
awe at X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight.
Then the sounding-boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.* All the kukasiut now return to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A hoop-drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and [534]
when the song has been finished two men continue in turn to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend superintend the distribution of food, which follows his final [574]
dancing. As the kukasiut are eating, the marshals deliver their usual admonishments, a task that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back-wall of the house. Materials have been placed in readiness so that it is an easy matter to build a framework a few feet in height, of which the flat top is screened by a matting wall about three feet high. This is often decorated [531]
with designs of dyed cedar-bark without ritual significance as far as the Bella Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the kukasiut disperse, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place.

among the Bella Bella, Fort Rupert, and Rivers Inlet people. Indeed, in Bella Coola a poor man may be the most devoted Cannibal of all, if he has been able duly to celebrate and perform his right in this respect. Nor is the dance carried out with the same vigour in Bella Coola as among the tribes of the outer coast.

The ritual of different prerogatives varies to such an extent that several accounts must be given, in spite of the repetition that this form of presentation entails. On account of the length of time necessary, a Cannibal dance usually begins early in the season. The following describes the manner in which Kiwaitlala of Kimsquit, who can bite the living, carried out his rite; it was obtained from his brother, who is thoroughly conversant with the details. It will be convenient to refer to Kiwaitlala as X, and to use the present tense throughout.

A meeting is held at which the marshals and others choose, in agreement with X and his relatives, a day suitable for him to commence his performance. Under normal circumstances it is on some pretext that a marshal announces that he can hear X's call, and on the following evening, when the ritual has been completed, the uninitiated are startled to hear continuous whistling from the slopes of the mountains near the village. The instruments used are of the usual bladder type, but the long-drawn-out sound, termed Atilkva, is said to be the voice of the kindly supernatural woman, Snitsmin a.[*]

[*] The sole function of this being seems to be the restoring to life of those who appear to have been killed in the performance of Sacrier rites. The Bella Coola are uncertain whether or not she is identical with Tlatqulitsa a. The noise which heralds her coming is produced by the whistles of four Sacrier who throughout the night range the forests and mountains within ear-shot of the village. By bending their heads up and down, they are able to increase the weirdness and apparent distressness of the sound. The four travel in single file; the leader blows, and when his breath is nearly exhausted he presses the hand of the second man, who starts whistling forthwith, while the original leader drops to the rear. As the second becomes weary, he signals in the same way to the third, and so on; in this way the whistling is continuous, and the uninitiated are convinced that it cannot be caused by mortals, even if such an idea should occur to them. If a non-member should meet the four, they would at once kill him or make him a prisoner, keeping him out of sight until he could be initiated into the society.

quarry into a converging "v" of houses, or someone may lie down on hair to attract the Cannibal so that the other lurking persons can secure him. No effort is spared to make the contest realistic. Then they carry the captive, struggling and biting, to the canoes and set out for the village. The preliminaries are lengthened or curtailed until the tide is favourable for the navigation of the creek, about two hours in the usual case assumed. When in mid-stream, the cry, ye . . ., is again raised; the supposed Cannibal has once more escaped! All this time X himself has been hiding in or near the village, and he now appears. Instantly the hokaxiat left in the neighbourhood set off in pursuit, those returning on the canoes hurry their passage and join the chase. After a struggle they succeed in capturing X and bringing him to the village.

The Cannibal acts like a demoniac animal, struggling, kicking, and biting as if his adventures had entirely deranged his reason. He drags his captors, a number of strong hokaxiat, to the various houses, and they are barely able to restrain him within the doorways and to force him out, biting and raving at them. A skilful actor is able to impress the uninitiated to a considerable extent, and of course he is supported by his associates. When every house has been visited, X is carried back to his own and a herald summons all the hokaxiat to cure him. The uninitiated are allowed to crowd near the door to watch.

The assumption is that X has had the nature and instincts of an animal enter into him; if this cannibalistic incubus* can be driven out by beating time, he will be restored to sanity. Two long, thin sounding-boards have been prepared previously, as well as a number of birch sticks with which the hokaxiat beat time. One man stands up to lead the drummers, and the sticks rise and fall in unison with his movements, in the manner previously described. At first X prowls around the house,

*This expression will be used henceforth as an interpretation of ai-ikim, the power in form of an animal which, having entered a man, compels him to eat strange foods.

until it is accepted by all that he is one of the men who should be called upon to take part in all rites. If possible, he endeavors to legalize his position by a distribution of presents. Men are always eager to become singers, both for fame and for emoluments. 533* 796* 575* [555] [424]

New songs are required every year for nawat and kwiniu dances, necessitating an almost limitless number of compositions. Singers frequently make use of fragments of old tunes, or snatches from half-forgotten songs, but they are ridiculed as inefficient if the plagiarism be too obvious. Tunes are always prepared in advance; in fact, proficient composers spend much of their time at all seasons of the year in humming over to themselves possible combinations. When word is passed around that a song is required, they meet in some lonely spot and each who has one in readiness hums it, tapping a gentle accompaniment. After considerable discussion, one is selected as being the most suitable and the singers make themselves familiar with it. Words are then put to it, consisting of fragments from the ancestral myth of the person for whom it has been prepared, or from some other theme appropriate to the occasion. Sometimes this is done by the composer of the tune; sometimes by another singer more familiar with the subject. The provision of words is considered less difficult and less important than the composition of a tune; no one knows the source of inspiration for the latter, but the former is said to come from either the heart or the head. All ceremonial songs are divided into three sections; kolulo·s or first part, ás·iko·tl or second part, and ālox or third part, separated from one another by the siwnālos, wordless chorus. The three parts correspond, approximately, to verses and each contains four, rarely six, subdivisions. In mourning songs there are sometimes as many as six or eight ālox, and the whole is correspondingly lengthened.

On the night of a ceremony, the singers always take their places beforehand for a final rehearsal. Each brings his own beating-stick, a stout baton about two feet long to pound on the floor in time with his singing. The only other musical [534]

* 533 instrument is the drum.[1] In former times the drum consisted
* 796 solely of a box, though recently skin drums have been adopted
* 575 from the Carriers. There is usually one singer especially pro-[534] ficient in using this, though sometimes another takes his place;
[177] all such arrangements are completed during the final rehearsal. A final decision is also reached as to who shall fill the three principal parts, sanḱwelsám, ālsaia, and lsulkum. It is the duty of the sanḱwelsám or leader, to regulate the time; he squats facing the others, who are grouped in a close semicircle, and indicates the rhythm by pounding with his stick on the floor. When a song is to start, he first taps rapidly, then modifies and regulates it throughout. The leader should be the best musician among the singers, and the same individual usually functions on all occasions although a rearrangement is sometimes necessary. In the centre of the singers sits the ālsaia, announcer, who must possess a powerful voice. As already mentioned, every song consists of three parts, each with several subdivisions. When the leader has beaten time rapidly to indicate that the singers are ready, the announcer bellows out the words of the first subdivision so that all the audience can hear them. Crash! goes the leader's stick and his voice gives the key for singing the words just called out, in which the audience is expected to join. As they are finishing, the announcer roars the next subdivision, and the same procedure is repeated. Instead of proceeding to the third, the announcer often next returns to the first, following it by the second. The subdivisions of a single part are never sung through in order once only, there are always repetitions and ramifications according to the discretion of the announcer. At the end of the first part, the leader again beats time rapidly in which his fellow-singers join.
[535] If a dancer is performing, he crouches down without making any effort to keep time with the rapid tapping, and the singing ceases. After a short pause, the second part is sung in the same manner, followed likewise by the third. The function of 776 The Thunder-bird and his companions appear in the kō'sint ceremonial.

575 When they enter the house, a dancer appears who carries an instrument in [534] the shape of a bird-rattle (Plate XI, Fig. 7), which is provided with holes in its lower side, and has a loose back. This implement is filled with cedar-bark and eagle-down, and is shaken by the dancer. The eagle-down is thus made to fly about in the house, symbolizing the wealth and power of the Thunder-bird.

184 In the preceding pages I have summarized the principal features of 773 Bella Coola mythology, which are characteristic of the traditions of the whole tribe. Besides these, there are other groups of traditions which are very conflicting. One reason for the existence of numerous contradictory traditions must be looked for in the peculiar social organization of the Bella Coola. In former times, when the tribe was populous, the Bella Coola inhabited a great many villages. The inhabitants of each village are considered the descendants of a number of mythical ancestors who were sent down by Sgnx. Each of these village communities has traditions of its own, which are its property, and which are not well known to the rest of the tribe. Many of these traditions refer to the origin of our world, and for this reason a number of the most important myths differ in various villages. Indications of such conflicting ideas may be found in the traditions recorded in the preceding pages. To make this subject clear, it is necessary to describe somewhat fully the traditions belonging to a number of village communities. Before recording these traditions I shall enumerate the villages of the tribe.
103 The following list is the result of repeated inquiries. In it the names and 361 locations of the villages are given in consecutive order from the mouth of 773 Bentinck Arm upward along Bella Coola River, and the names of the mythical ancestors of the village communities have been added where these have been ascertained.

Village.	Location.	Ancestors.
1. Q'ut'ina	At the bay of this name.
2. Sr'ia	At the entrance of South Bentinck Arm.	Tōuna'ua.
3. Nuxat'q!	On North Bentinck Arm.	Sranistā'ua, Nuxqo'xlaa, Sx'ista, and their sister E'ai.'xlana.
4. Pe'ixla	At the entrance of the valley opening on the north side of the mouth of Bella Coola River.	Sxā'hanx, Yuyā'lk', Mantsi'i, Sisā'i.
5. Atqia'xi	The present division at the north side of Bella Coola River, near its mouth.	Iuyā'yōx, Xōnxā'nuxnam, Snuxnala'la, and their sister Lequi'xia.

575 allowed to re-enter the houses; but before doing so for the first time, he 796 must stop at the door and shout, "Wa, wa, wa!" Then he jumps over the threshold. Accompanied by many men, he is led, after four days more, to the river for final purification. He is pushed into the water, but struggles to free himself. He tries to duck his companions, and utters his cries. Finally he is led back. Then he weeps, because the spirit has left him entirely. The people beat time while he is going back to the house. Then he is offered a piece of salmon, which is placed on his throat, while the people shout, "Hoip, hoip!" The salmon is taken away again, and after some time he is allowed to take one bite. Then he must lie down. After the dancing season is ended, he is again allowed to eat in the same way as other people do. The piece of salmon that was placed on his throat is eaten by children as a protection against sickness. Finally a ceremony is performed which is called "taking the lip of the S'a'ɬpata out of the Cannibal's body." While this is being done, the people cry, "Hoip!" Then they throw the lip upon another Cannibal, who at once falls into an ecstasy. Then the shaman takes it back and throws it up towards the sky, where it disappears. The dish and the spoon that the Cannibal used during his ecstasy are destroyed. For four years he must wear a small ring of red cedar-bark, in summer as well as in winter.

The Ôlx is also initiated in heaven by the being described before (p. 35). There are different traditions regarding his initiation among different clans. Some Ôlx, during their performances, walk ropes which are stretched [534] through the house. When he returns from his initiation, small whistles, called cat'laxa, which imitate the voices of eagles, are heard outside of the houses. Then the Ôlx enters in a state of ecstasy, scratching the people who assemble to hold him, and tearing their blankets. Finally the people succeed in placing a blanket over his head, and he begins to come to his senses. When he enters the house, the people beat time, then he teaches the chorus-leader a song. The mask worn by the Ôlx is quite large, and characterized by a large nose (Plate XII, Fig. 9). He carries a dancing-club (Plate XII, Fig. 10), and rings made of red cedar-bark. He is accompanied by two assistants, who also wear masks.

VII.

121 We will now discuss the probable origin of the mythology described in the preceding pages. In order to do so, it is necessary to make a brief statement in regard to the social organization of the neighboring tribes. In 114 another paper[1] I have fully discussed the considerable amount of borrowing 177 that has taken place among the Coast tribes, and the relation of their every morning when the sun rises. He takes care that he rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the kō'sint these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks. Xō'mtsioa and Xēmxēmalā'otɩa wear the design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Xō'mtsioa by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Xēmxēmalā'otɩa has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Aiamkī'lik·a and Aiamalā'otɩa wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Q'ōmq'ōmkī'lik·a and Q'ō'mtsioa have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qula'xawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The next in order, Kalō'lias (who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue. The ninth, Ac'amā'k, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called L'ōtsā'aplēLāua (the eater), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a bladder filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The sisau'k·, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of the clans, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who had gone out hunting met the sisau'k· and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean their houses and to strew them with clean sand before he consented to enter. Then he danced the sisau'k· and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with trails of ermine skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sun. Ever since that time the Bī'lxula dance the sisau'k·. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each clan its secrets. Each clan has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the sisau'k· only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are the sacred possessions of each clan. All clans, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a clan are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various clans, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the clan to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisau'k·. A person can not take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nusk'ēlu'sta, the Indian, to whom I tribe are superior to themselves in carpentry, and ascribe their skill to the fact that many of them are descendants of Yulätimat. Some of the coastal tribes are said to believe that Älquntäm erred in the manufacture of many of the sea mammals, giving them, for example, human heads on fish bodies; he later rectified this by sending his Carpenters to adjust their form. This is not a Bella Coola belief. One elderly man stated that the skill of the Carpenters in painting and modelling was derived from a little girl named Qoxltanao; no confirmation could be obtained for this statement and the information was vague and unreliable.

Since their creation of the sky and many features of this world, as well as birds and animals, the Carpenters have entered but little into the lives of the Bella Coola. Like other supernatural beings, they are capable of going anywhere, but for many generations they have not been seen on this earth. Their most important function, perhaps, is to act as patrons for various kusiut dancers. This subject will be described in detail in vol. II, chap. 1; for the moment it is enough to say that many supernatural beings regard members of this semi-sacred society as their protégés, and grant them power to perform dances. On these occasions masked figures are used to represent the patrons, thus enlightening uninitiated persons as to the appearance and attributes of various supernatural beings.

Among the many residents of Nusmät·a are two sons of Älquntäm, Sänoälqumults Älquntäm and Sno'olxults Älquntäm. The former in particular is dearly loved by his father and is often spoken of as Nuälexwanuwultam, "The Cherished One." These two beings take no part in the affairs of mortals except as patrons of kusiut dancers. Like all supernatural beings they are considered to be immortal. Since Älquntäm has two sons it is to be assumed that he has, or had, a wife. Her name is not generally known, although she is sometimes spoken of as Nusmät·aiew·a, "The Woman of Nusmät·a." There are also many stories describing his amours with human women resulting in semi-supernatural offspring.

* 776 and gaping holes in the earth. In such regions no fire can be
[778] lit. The last known area of this kind is up the river behind Green Bay, about four miles from the sea. So far as could be learnt, bābunk' have never assisted Bella Coola in any way nor played any part in the social life of the community. They are feared on account of their supernatural power, but appear so seldom that they are practically disregarded.

More common than the last, and accordingly more important, is the haohao. It is an enormous bird with bony wings and long, flexible beak. As it flies, the wings rattle violently, and its note, an oft repeated "Hao, hao, hao," can be heard for miles. These birds are said to have been numerous in former
● [535] years, and are well known to all Bella Coola. Masked figures [575] representing them are often used at kusiut dances. The haohao is feared for its practice of inserting its long beak into the 761 rectum of anyone sleeping carelessly in the forest and drawing
* 776 forth his entrails. This can be prevented by standing upright [789] a staff, such as all hunters carry, before going to sleep.
[539]

A popular story states that once, not many years ago, a number of men camped at the edge of a canyon near their home, without taking this precaution. One of them was awakened by a slight movement of one of his companions and, looking up, he saw the long neck and beak of a haohao projecting over the rim of the canyon and sucking his partner's entrails. The convulsive shiver of the stricken man had awakened him. With his bow he shot an arrow into the bird's neck, causing it to disappear over the brink. Presently the long beak reappeared and he discharged another arrow with the same result. Again and again this happened until the attack ceased at dawn. The hunter assumed that a single bird had been repeatedly attacking, but when he looked over the edge of the cliff, he saw below a number of carcasses, each with an arrow in its throat. The canyon must have been a roosting place for the birds. His companions seemed still asleep, but when he investigated he found that all were dead; only the slightly enlarged orifice showed how they had been killed.

* 776 No haohao has been seen within recent years, but one infor-

instructed people about the significance of death omens; it was Raven who showed them the use of slings; and it was Raven who constructed secluded caves and ledges to serve as meeting-places for chiefs. 773 [622] [823]

In brief, the Bella Coola regard Raven as an explorer, teacher, and inventor, whose power, obtained from Ālquntām, enabled him to construct and outwit his maker, but not to create. Much of his work was for the good of mankind, but much was evil and malicious, an aspect which belongs to mythology. Essentially human, Raven could have been included among anthropomorphic, as well as among zoomorphic beings. He differs from most of the supernatural ones in belonging entirely to the past, as his descendants have none of the first Raven's power. It is doubtful whether he still exists, but in any case he has long since ceased to take any interest in the affairs of the Bella Coola, who consider him only as a figure of mythology and ancient history. 773 776 [825]

SUPERNATURAL BEINGS OF THE VEGETABLE AND MINERAL KINGDOMS

Bella Coola beliefs concerning anthropomorphic and zoomorphic beings are relatively clear and exact; their appearance is known, their powers and functions recognized. The supernatural attributes of trees and plants are less definite. Ālquntām created the former in the beginning of time, and they were consequently able to talk and act like human beings at that distant period. Owing to the degeneration of man, mortals are no longer able to converse with trees, although the latter can still understand our remarks. In a vague way, the Bella Coola continue to think of trees as having human personalities, but so little is known of their powers, and they enter so seldom into contact or conflict with mortals, that they are practically ignored. 776 824

In an equally vague manner, Nature is regarded as a Mother, giving birth to the trees and plants. One of the kusiut dances portrays this birth of the flowers every spring (II, p. 196). [535] [575]

774 becomes critical. Only a shaman (I, p. 539) can return one, and 755 if he fails death always results. In some cases a spirit leaves [753] its owner without apparent reason; he becomes insane, tries to eat dirt, and his relatives realize at once what is the matter.
[756] They summon a shaman who takes off his cape, hangs it like a pouch on his stick, and points it in all directions as he sings his shaman's song. Finally he locates what is missing, and traps it in his cloak, which he places around the sick man. This restores the element and the sufferer recovers immediately. Another method is for the shaman to press the back of the patient's neck, and by blowing and spitting cause the wandering spirit to return. Either cure must be performed by a shaman because of the supernatural power required.

774 Spirits can be extracted in various ways. Shamans can draw one forth by sucking at the back of the neck between their cupped hands; in former times, some were so powerful that they could extract them by their mere presence. During 774 kusiut dances (II, chap. 1), the uninitiated are told that if they 575 enter the house where a ceremony is taking place, or even pass
[535] on the sidewalk outside the door, their spirits will be drawn from them by the power within and attracted to the dancer or to the sacred platform on which he is concealed. Many [178] stories are told of this, which were firmly believed by the uninitiated until the last few years. Members of the society claim that their great power acts as a magnet to the spirits of all but their associates, except children in arms; the latter can be taken by their mothers into the house, because their supernatural elements have not developed sufficient strength to 774 leave their bodies. A person may also lose his spirit through a sudden shock. If two people meet unexpectedly in the forest and one of them shouts loudly at the other, even if only in fun, the spasmodic contraction of the muscles is enough to expel it.
[761] The person to whom this happens falls down as if dead, and [756] though he soon recovers, his spirit has left him, and if it is not brought back by a shaman he dies a lingering death.

775 At death, the spirit permanently leaves the body. In some

Ceremonial chastity is considered almost a necessity to hunters, and in former years a man would rarely, if ever, set out to seek game without fortifying himself by at least several days of continence followed by washing. In the few cases known of a female assuming the clothing and activities of a male, she has been forced to hire a man to sleep with her on the proper nights before starting to hunt. But hunters are by no means the only ones to observe ceremonial chastity. If a man wants to build a salmon-weir, it is by this means that he makes himself strong enough to succeed; if he plays cards, good fortune is sought in the same fashion. The guests at a potlatch observe ceremonial chastity so that their host may not forget them in his distribution of presents, the host, that his guests may arrive on time. The kusiut dancer thus fortifies himself for the performance of a dangerous ritual. In this way a man experiences dreams foretelling the future. In every desire or activity of life, ceremonial chastity is a potent means of success, not infallible, usually combined with prayer and in many cases with sacrifice, but a background and accompaniment to every means of propitiation. If a man has conspicuous ill-luck, it is because he has failed to observe ceremonial chastity; if he succeeds, it is because he has done so. At the present time there is living in the Bella Coola valley an old white man who for years has ranged the mountains in search of gold; he has been unsuccessful, and the Bella Coola believe that he will never succeed until he observes ceremonial chastity.

The strength which a man may acquire through the practice of this rite is almost limitless. A man may be ailing on account of the leaning of his tally post, but, if he energetically and faithfully observes chastity, it will become straightened, whether automatically or through the agency of Ālquntärv is uncertain. After the termination of a long period of continence, a man's spirit is so strong that his friends place their hands on the back of his neck in order to absorb some of the power radiating from his spirit. Ancient myths record how the mere force engendered in a man's body by lengthy abstin-

614 The converse of this process of loss is the assimilation to 553 an origin myth of names originally brought into the ancestral
178 family by a woman from abroad. Unless intercourse and 773 friendly relations were maintained by "return marriages," in a few generations no tradition would be remembered to account for the name, and this, if used at all, would be interwoven into the well-known ancestral myth. Hence a myth is not static with regard to the names embodied in it. These change from generation to generation; it is probable that elements of the story itself suffer like additions and alterations, even though the people do not consider this to be the case.

611 The Bella Coola regard the ancestral family as a social unit,
614 not only in terms of the present, but as stretching back to the first settlement of the earth. Viewed from this angle, it is in fact, though not admitted to be so by the Bella Coola, a unilateral grouping with patrilineal descent, which may, in both the most recent and most ancient generations, be marked by matrilineal descent instead. A man frequently uses prerogatives obtained through his mother, her mother, or even her mother's mother, but it is tacitly assumed that for many previous generations such rights passed in the patrilineal line. Sometimes this succession extended back to the beginning of time; in other cases, prerogatives were transmitted matrilineally for a considerable period after the settlement of the earth, before gradually becoming patrilineal.

614 It has been thus far assumed that the only prerogative
424 wrapped up in an ancestral name is a knowledge of the myth
551 in which it is embodied. But there are others. For example, several of the first inhabitants of the world are said to have erected totem-poles, each of which was displayed by its owner at the gathering when he took for himself a name. Thenceforth, the only person entitled to use that particular totem-
[532] pole design was the person with the legal right to the name in [535] question. The same principle governs all dance names; each entitles its owner to perform a certain ceremonial. Thus it is possible to enlarge the previous definition by saying that:

establish himself with the traditions of his new home. This is another illustration of the patrilineal tendency of the whole organization. 621 [614] [553]

Politically, the village is the most important Bella Coola unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem to have been unimportant; individual jealousies were common, and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighbouring settlements were generally on friendly terms and often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the outer coast, about to attack Sinxł, passed within a quarter of a mile of Q̓omqo·ts without its inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours. [628] [682] [578] [627] [628]

As far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bella Coola groupings. If one individual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch system (vol. I, chap. IV), he is "chief" of the village, and his advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such obedience as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the eldest of the first group of settlers, the first chief, but this is not sufficient to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat- 622 554 [556] 621 623 535 796

621 623 ters, and the village constitutes a unit for all dances; in fact [535] this ceremonial unity is its most important function.

[796] With the exception of a few villages built on the seashore, each Bella Coola settlement consists of a row of houses on the 361 river bank. These are of the usual rectangular, plank-built [184] type typical of the North-West Coast. In front of them [342] stretches a sidewalk, usually supported by piles on the side nearest the river to make it level. The houses, too, in many [171] cases have piles beneath their front ends, made necessary by the steep slope of the bank. In large villages there may be two rows of houses, behind and above one another. Usually there [487] is a rough path parallel to the row of houses at the very edge of the river. The number of houses varies; before the smallpox [164] epidemic some villages contained as many as thirty or forty, others, only two or three. There is no definite arrangement of the houses; anyone may build where there is a vacant space. [433] Much the same arrangement occurs in the sea-coast villages, each of which depends for its main sustenance on an ocean fish-trap, as the river villages depend on a salmon-weir.

342 The central part of each house is occupied by a large fire, [354] often sunk a considerable distance below the level of the floor, and around this is an open space free to all. Toward the side-walls are raised the partitions, forming bedrooms for the different families, or for different members of one. In many cases the flooring is removed in three or four parts of the house for small fires on which different groups cook, the central fire being used for heating and for more important meals. The [592] number of families occupying a house depends on its size; an [622] important chief, with many relatives, often builds an enormous house which is occupied by ten or more families; smaller houses contain only two or three. Life in the larger houses is free and open; people are constantly passing in and out, and any-[261] one present when food is being distributed is given a share as a matter of course. Most of the houses are decorated with [353] carved upright posts and paintings on the beams and back-wall. [535] A door through the latter leads to the back-room, so important in dances.

ened by the age-long power of his ancestor. Finally, in old age a powerful chief is careless where he seats himself; his fame is so great that he can afford to disregard all conventions. 554 556* 622 [183]

POWER OF CHIEFS

It will be seen from the foregoing that chieftainship among the Bella Coola does not depend on hereditary rank, still less on an elective principle, but on the individual's prestige as displayed, especially in his ability to acquire for himself a firm seat by the giving of presents. As he continues to do so his influence becomes ever greater. Consequently, it is impossible to state clearly what are the powers of a chief; such depend upon his prestige and influence. For a Bella Coola chief has no executive or judicial authority; what deference is shown to him depends on his success as a man, a factor which is constantly rising or falling.

The coming of the white man has enabled the Bella Coola to earn comparatively large sums of money by trapping and fishing. This in turn has enabled nearly everyone to give at least one potlatch, a very different state of affairs from that which prevailed in the last century when it required years of toil for a man to amass the necessary food and skins. Consequently, in many towns there were no men who had given potlatches, so that a man's prestige was estimated by the presents he had given at smaller ceremonies. Sometimes, moreover, a man preferred to increase his fame by giving rites of a different nature, such as kusiut dances, and the presents then distributed might elevate him in the eyes of the community, to a position above that of a man who had given a potlatch. This, however, was unusual. [179] [434] [431] [535]

After a fourth potlatch a man is accorded a position of eminence, and is termed a numitl chief. Numitl is an untranslatable word, with the significance of "passage," an allusion to the amount of goods which have passed through his hands. Jealous and vulgar-minded persons pun on the word, applying [578]

184 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there
476 was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity
* 556 of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Susask Society

551 The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position
* 556 of eminence are usually embodied in myths dealing with the 575 first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been 614 stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions record other designations as well, each of which carries with it [595] the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as susask. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as susask names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men
* 556 and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way 575 a number of times, acquiring a new susask name on each occa-
[562] sion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a susask name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

present, and the fame of the initiate is thereby carried farther afield than would be possible if only Bella Coola were in attendance.* Every individual duly secluded and given a susask name feels himself ceremonially allied to others who have had a similar experience, and they form a grouping which may be termed the susask secret society. 553 556* 575

The close connection between this society and chiefs is obvious from the presence of names of each type in the same ancestral myths. None the less, every chief, that is a person with duly validated ancestral name and seat, is not a susask, unless he has validated a susask name for himself and undergone the period of seclusion. Conversely, a man may be a duly authorized member of the susask although lacking a seat and the other marks of chieftainship. The relationship is, however, so close that the Bella Coola think of the susask society as a society of chiefs. Susask dances take place at potlatches and funerals, and occasionally at gatherings of less importance. Difficulties arise at the death of a chief who has failed to use some of his goods for the acquisition of a susask name. Such a case took place at the death of an important Bella Coola in the summer of 1923. Theoretically, he was ignorant of susask rites, but after much discussion these were used on account of his importance as a numitl chief, an instance of the manner in which a man's personal importance over-rules ceremonial dictates. 575 622 [553] [535] [766] [183]

The Bella Coola believe that only some of their susask name-prerogatives came to this earth at the beginning of time with their first ancestors, and that many more have been acquired later by supernatural experiences. These were especially common among their forbears as they ranged over this earth seeking places to settle in the beginning of time. No susask name can be assumed casually; each must have had a specific origin. There are few susask origin myths, though theoretically there should be one to account for every name. The explanation appears to lie in the undoubted fact that many susask prerogatives have been acquired comparatively recently 424 551 575 773 [177]

*556 wards and forwards sway the contestants with shouting and merriment, and those who have failed to carry away their boxes of food hasten to remove them out of the danger zone. It is a time of licence, and even one of the most influential chiefs may be struck by the ram or his food scattered without consideration. The ram is driven back, but those who bear it steer the log so that instead of passing out through the door it strikes the front wall, shattering some of the boards with their old paintings. With a shout they drive forwards again until part of the wall at the back of the house is likewise destroyed. Then those within the house gain the mastery and the log is carried outside, dragging its struggling bearers with it. They drop the log and return inside as if nothing untoward had occurred. This destruction of the house walls is a necessary preparation for their replacement with new paintings on new boards. When quiet has been restored a herald stands up.

"Listen!" he cries. "Ye chiefs, ye wives of chiefs, and ye commoners, soon we shall hear the supernatural beings."

533 Then the singers[9] beat out the tune of any kusiut. He whose 535 song it is begins to dance, using the type of which he has the 575 prerogative, but as the supernatural being with whom he has a ceremonial affinity is not present, the dance is not considered
*556 sacred. As soon as one kusiut has finished, the tune of another is beaten, and he too dances. The singers change from kusiut to kusiut, and please themselves about the order in which they shall dance, also about how many shall perform. This continues until late in the night. Then they beat out a nuask tune and the member of that society to whom it belongs performs his dance, a non-sacred affair, like those of the kusiut. One after another dances as his or her tune is beaten out, until dawn approaches. Meanwhile several nuask have been sent outside

[9] Henceforth in this monograph the term "singer" will be used as a translation of the Bella Coola word, nuxiuul. The singers sit together behind the fire. It is their duty to remember the tune and text of every song; to beat out this tune for every dancer and to accompany him by singing the words of his song.

533 This is presently heard. Y may be in his own house, but at
* 556 once any number of nusak rush in and conduct him, concealed 575 in their midst, to the back-room of X's dwelling. All the nusak of the village begin to gather there; those who are not members of the society are also free to enter the main part of the house, though they cannot take any part in the proceedings. They lurk near the door, watching with interest mixed with [781] fear, and ready to flee if the danger from supernatural beings seems too acute.

After some delay, a whistle is heard at intervals, gradually becoming louder as if the supernatural being, of which it is the voice, were coming nearer. Presently it sounds immediately outside the door, and a siki rushes forth. He returns in a moment, followed, amid the breathless excitement of the uninitiated, by a figure masked as a bird or animal. The design [532] represents Y's crest, or some creature with which one of his ancestors came in contact, and which is therefore regarded as having the same sociological importance. A member of the society has carved the mask, another wears it, but this the uninitiated do not know.

[776] "It is a tawinam,"[18] they gasp.

The figure crosses the house and bends down beside the singers to whom it appears to be whispering. Presently they begin, softly, to tap out a song in rapid time as if the supernatural visitor had just taught it to them. It is divided into two or three parts and the theme is taken from Y's ancestral myth.[19] After two or three rehearsals, the singers beat out the time more loudly and accompany it with their voices, while [535] the masked figure dances. A number of older nusak accompany the performer as he whirls around the house; it is pretended that this is necessary to shield the spectators, though the real function is to guide the dancer whose sight is handi-

[18] Meaning, "What is displayed," or, "A materialization."

[19] If the nuqkyta is a son or other near relative of the chief who is giving the potlatch, the theme may consist of honoring references to the goods about to be distributed. This is customary for X himself if he performs on a nusak at the actual ceremony.

capped by the mask. If the tatwinam represents Wasp[14] or Grizzly Bear, he does not make a circuit and a fluent nsask explains that to do so would be unsafe owing to the ferocity of these animals. When the song is ended, the figure passes into the back-room. After a short interval it reappears, recrosses the house, and leaves by the front door, to the accompaniment of increased whistling.

A few myths embody two tatwinam. In this case, a second figure presently enters and the same ritual is repeated for a second song. This usually differs, musically, from the first, being in three parts and with even more rapid time. More often, the second song is merely beaten out by the singers without the appearance of a tatwinam to supply an obvious source.

575

This is the normal, but not the only practice with regard to a tatwinam. In some cases the figure does not appear until after the singing of the first song, and the uninitiated are told that it has been attracted by the music. In this case it passes into the back-room, later to reappear and leave by the front door. An announcement is made that it has brought a strange power, that Y has become peculiar, and that his name is now, for example, Qnaqwasila. A herald bears this news through the village. A second song is then sung in due course.

[776]

The tatwinam is difficult to classify among Bella Coola supernatural beings. It appears in the form of an ancestral crest, but the nsask do not seem to have taught the uninitiated to regard it as Y's actual forefather. It remains as a supernatural embodiment of his crest, a materialization of an element of family history, and a motive for the use by Y of a mask representing the apparition. The uninitiated do not seek further; they have seen a wonderful sight and are content.

[177

Several of the older nsask stated that the tatwinam concept was not indigenous to Bella Coola; it had been recently

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, X expects that the presents, if any, made to a few individuals after the general distribution, will be returned with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been animated, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly nature by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly announced, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be. 553 556* 575 [558]

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the initiates are practised. Members of the susook society join in with the singers; the other spectators listen attentively, full of interest, but take no part. X with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart. [533]

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare event, and susook members were initiated at local gatherings. The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be convenient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, when the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place. 535 556* 575 177

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out[16] the tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close succession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark decorated with pendant weasel skins, and the distinctive susook head-dress (see Plate 15).[1] This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion 292 535 556* 575 237

535 of the head-dress hang weasel skins. In Bella Bella it is said to 556 be customary for a skin to be added on every occasion when a suaok is confined to the back-room. This may happen as many 575 as fifteen times to the child of wealthy parents, and a few Bella
Coola have adopted the practice of marking each with a skin.
[237] Usually, some six or nine are hung in two tiers, without consideration of the number of times the wearer has been in seclusion. The central figure of the forehead mask is a head with [532] a hooked nose, the recurved hook being joined to the face itself. This figure does not vary with the wearer's ancestral myth, and no one knows what it represents. This design is [177] said to have been introduced to Bella Coola from the north a few generations ago; before that time the head-dress consisted [237] of a circular band of dyed cedar-bark, decorated with the tail
[824] feathers of one of the large woodpeckers. The Bella Coola call it simply, "forehead mask." Each initiate carries a hollow
[532] rattle, carved in the shape of a bird, which he holds in his right
[534] hand, belly uppermost. Long, long ago, when a dancer failed to do so, the rattle became alive and the bird flew away; hence, this rule has been obeyed ever since.

535 Each initiate takes up his station in some part of the house
556 behind the fire and dances to the beating of the sticks. The 575 left hand of each is clasped behind his back and in his right he holds the rattle and keeps it in constant motion by shaking his wrist. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a good dancer. Keeping the body stiff and the legs close together, he rises with slight jumps, barely altering his position on the floor. Sometimes he slowly turns around sunwise[11] in his series of jumps, at other times he does not alter his position. The head is bent from side to side and downwards at each jump, causing the eagle down to fly in all directions. Suaok assistants blow more of the material on to the head-dress at intervals (see Plate 16).[1]

[821] [11]The Bella Coola believe that the sun moves from east to south to west to [796] north. Many ceremonial movements follow this direction, which will henceforth be described as sunwise.

[1] [See cat 116, facing p 219 - ANALYST]

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar droning cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food. 535 556* 575 [424]

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the susaok society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are secluded a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is secluded, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so easy of late years to give potlatches that the simpler rite has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shorter ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests. [554]

DELIVERING OF INVITATIONS

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch; it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to summon those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that each guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents. 556* [203] [558]

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [203] [484]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the potlatch is recognized to such an extent that an attack upon envoys is unthinkable, though one or two myths recount how this unwritten law was violated on rare occasions. A canoe meeting potlatch messengers veers over to the other side of the channel to give them the right of way. 203 556* [484] [726]

On reaching the destination the canoe is brought to close to shore until the inhabitants of the village have gathered on the beach, which they swiftly do on the arrival of strangers. The messenger sounds his whistle, the significance of which is fully understood by members of the susaok society. Any chief who wishes to show his wealth and importance will invite them to his house. As they are landing, he sends a herald to summon a number of influential people of his village, who seat themselves in their rightful places. As the messengers enter they are given seats on the bench behind the fire, the spot usually reserved for chiefs. A number of lads are called in to toast smoked salmon, and when this has been done the fish are broken into shreds by young girls and served to the messengers on a mat, in lieu of a table-cloth. The envoys do not deliver their message as soon as they arrive. On the contrary, they spend the rest of the day aimlessly talking with their hosts, and sleep in the house where they have been received. [575] [262]

The following day likewise passes without ceremony, but towards nightfall the host summons all his fellow-villagers to his house. The singers take up their customary places and beat out a kusiut tune. Upon hearing his or her air, the owner of it starts to dance. Using their own discretion, the singers beat out the tunes of kusiut after kusiut, and each dances. In like fashion the singers beat out susaok songs, and the owner of each dances. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the dances are merely of a ceremonial, not a sacred, nature. When all have danced, each gives a present to the envoys. These gifts are not returnable. They are merely "eagle down," but it is necessary that something be given to validate the dances. The value is immaterial, so far as the purpose is concerned, though a chief who wishes to exhibit his chief-like 203 535 556*

203 nature will try to bestow a valuable present. If a man is too
* 556 poor to give anything, he can avoid the obligation by not dancing when his tune is beaten out. The presents are piled [535] together, and then the host, aided by several important chiefs, [537] distributes them to the messengers, at the same time making laudatory speeches. The chief of the envoys receives more than the members of his crew.

Then the messenger-chief stands up and announces the names of those whom X has invited to his potlatch, using in each case the ancestral designation of the person summoned. Then the envoys, in a body, go to every house in the village. Probably all to be invited are present in the house of the chief, yet the messenger-chief must call out in the doorway of each house:

"Chief So-and-so, prepare your paddles and leave tomorrow."

Early next morning the messengers rouse those whom they have invited and, as a mark of respect, help them to carry their goods to the canoes. There is an attitude of shaming com-[558] bined with that of deference, since those assisted will have been placed under obligations. They also take to their canoes their own recently acquired goods. Envoys and guests set out together in their respective craft, and only separate as they near Bella Coola.

ARRIVAL OF THE GUESTS

* 556 While the canoes containing the first party of guests remain 575 at anchor to wait for high tide, the envoys proceed at once to X's house, now completely redecorated if not entirely rebuilt. Here a huge fire is blazing, and members of the susook society are passing in and out, making ready for the ceremony. Both [302] men and women beautify themselves by painting their faces in any designs they fancy, and by combing their hair and placing eagle down upon it. The guests at anchor lay planks [535] across their canoes so as to form a dancing platform. Then, as the tide rises, the singers in the house beat out the tune of

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

one after another of the concealed initiates, while the audience, consisting of susaok alone, join in the singing. As the sounds drift out to the guests, they too beat out some of their well-known susaok songs. 535 556 * 575

At high tide, as the canoes draw near, carefully guided by poles and saddles, the susaok troop down to the beach to meet the guests, led by a siki, who alone wears an apron of puffin beaks and carries a rattle. The singers beat out one of his tunes and the siki dances on the beach, while the supernatural whistle which has been sounding from the back-room of X's house, is now heard at his side, blown by an assistant under cover of his blanket. After the siki has danced, the singers among the guests, and there are always enough of them to make possible the beating out of the better known tunes, sing one of their siki's songs as he dances on the platform surmounting the canoes. [292] [533]

The Bella Coola siki, surrounded by a group of susaok, now begins to turn about in a frenzied manner, always sunwise, bending down, then straightening himself, twisting and writhing like a maniac. Finally, standing erect, he pretends to throw something to the foreign siki, and then falls to the ground. The recipient makes the motion of catching something heavy, and at the same time one of his accomplices in the canoe sounds another susaok whistle, deluding the uninitiated observers into the belief that some power has been transmitted, which is the source of the strange noise. The visiting siki revolves four times; twisting and bending, then straightens up and throws back his cloak, to expose a mask representing Mulakila. This has been concealed there all the time, but the uninitiated readily believe it to be the creature which has made the noise, or else that it is an object miraculously made by this being. The siki revolves four times more, with the mask in plain sight and the whistle constantly booming, while a fluent speaker "explains" the meaning of it all to the uninitiated who are watching with interest from the background.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

535 The reception of this power from his Bella Coola confrère
* 556 enables the guest siki to dance at X's potlatch, if he so desires.
575 In that case the guests are guided to X's house without further delay. If, however, he does not wish to dance, he goes through the motions of throwing something back to the Bella Coola siki, who pretends to catch it. He bends down, twists himself about, then throws back his cape—to display there the representation of Mulakila. At the time of throwing, the visiting siki had slipped his mask out of sight, so that those witnessing the transaction, ignorant of the fact that the recipient has had an identical mask hidden beneath his cape throughout, are suitably impressed. He now revolves four times, while an assistant, sheltered under a large cloak, sounds the whistle constantly. Then the siki makes the motion of throwing something to X's house, and after that the whistle sounds from within, while the man who had been blowing one beside the siki ceases. Thus the uninitiated are led to believe that the voice can proceed only from the place where the power over which the siki has control is situated.

* 556 The guests are conducted to X's house, to which a number 574 of young men carry their goods. A meal of toasted salmon, provided by X, is served to them by a number of youths, all of whom are eager to undertake this task throughout the ceremony. A section of the house is allotted to each party of guests, and within that space they arrange themselves according to convenience. Some informants state that the first group to arrive is seated nearest the fire. The whole of those invited are not placed according to rank. The amount of space allotted to each party of guests depends upon their number, and there is no particular choice made of a section in the house. X, or more often some one who speaks for him, welcomes the guests, and a spokesman from among them makes a suitable reply, usually with the assistance of an interpreter. After the meal, the guests can remain where they are or go out. As many as wish to do so stay in X's house, but many prefer to go to the homes of their friends in the village; it is a matter of convenience, not of ritual. 556* [574]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

In the evening, there may be no rite of any kind, but X often invites everyone to his house for the performance of non-ceremonial dances. The singers strike up one of his sisaok or a'alk (I, p. 273) tunes and he dances to it. Then a tune belonging to one of his relatives is beaten out, and he too dances. After several have thus performed, a meal is served and all disperse. No supernatural beings are in attendance, hence there is no solemnity to the occasion; the evening's rites merely serve to show the guests the dances owned by their host and his family. 535● 556*

As each party of guests arrives the same procedure is repeated. X provides food for those who have assembled from day to day, so he anxiously awaits the last-comers. When at last they come the guests from all other towns are in their allotted sections of X's house, and are free to make gibes at the tardiness of those latest in appearing. Occasionally, hard feelings are engendered in this way, although it is an established custom to mock at the last to arrive. They seat themselves and a small amount of food is given them. 556* 574 [628]

RITUAL CARRIED OUT BY THE GUESTS

Two youths, chosen by X for the purpose, sprinkle eagle down over the heads of all those present, as far as possible blowing it first over the chiefs. It serves as a token of good-will, and marks also the ceremonial nature of the occasion. Then a leading sisaok, perhaps a siki, stands up and says in effect: 556* [788] [237] [575]

"Thank you for coming. You are welcome. We thank you for coming to witness what X has done. He is delighted to have you here, because he has lost many of his relatives and wishes to perpetuate their memory. They would be grieved if he did not do so."

An elaborate meal is now served by a number of young men. [264]

* 556 The first course is dried cohoe salmon mixed with olachen 264 grease. The fish is first placed in boxes, approximately one to every four persons, though a chief may be honoured by an [262] individual box, and the grease poured over it. As always, any food not consumed is carried away. Failure to do so would [578] be an insult to X. Then round wooden dishes are distributed into which are poured the berries of Viburnum pauciflorum.
[262] The waiters pour olachen grease over these and the mixture is eaten with wooden spoons. These two foods are invariably the first meal of a potlatch.

* 556 If the siki of the last guests to arrive has not returned the power given him by the Bella Coola expert, he now stands up 575 and shakes his rattle as a signal that he desires to start his ● 535 dance. The Bella Coola siki also stands up, and the visiting siki contorts himself and finally pretends to produce something from his stomach, which he throws across to his colleague.
The latter feigns to catch it, cries hoip loudly several times, and makes the motions of hurling what he has just received into the room at the back of the house where the initiates are concealed. Then he sits down. Meanwhile the last-to-arrive party of guests have started to beat out the tune of one of the susaok[18] songs of their own siki who dances in time to it. Then another song is beaten out and another member of the party dances, and so on until all have danced who desire to do so.
Each wears his own head-dress and each performs in the manner already described. After the dancing, the members of this party of guests give presents to X and other Bella Coola chiefs. There is no fixed ratio between the value of the gifts
* 556 and the rank of the recipients, though chiefs receive more than [554] lesser men, and X most of all. These presents are spuxdjut, which may be translated as "eagle down-ness," merely a mark of friendship and goodwill. They are not returnable. Goods so received are distributed by X with his other possessions at [578] the potlatch, care being taken not to return them to the donors, which would be insulting.

[18] Xe-tle songs (I, p. 217) are sometimes used.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

After bestowal of these presents, the siki of the penultimate group of guests shakes his rattle, and exactly the same procedure is carried out by members of his party. They, too, give presents to X and the other Bella Coola chiefs. The same rites are carried out by each party of guests in the reverse order of their arrival. It is frequently near dawn before the first-comers have completed their dances and distribution of gifts. X then gives another meal to all, with no restriction on the choice of food. This concludes the night's ceremony, and the guests depart, except those who are staying in X's house. 556 *

THE POTLATCH: FIRST DAY

Considering the lengthy ceremonials of the preceding evening, it is not surprising that on this day no one stirs early. The guests receive their breakfast in the houses where they are accommodated, and meanwhile a number of young men gather in X's house to assist in the preparation of food for the main meal of the day. During the previous night a large amount of smoked mountain goat has been put in water to soak. This is now placed in a number of food-boxes, ready for distribution, water is added and hot stones lifted in to bring it to a boil. When the water comes to the boil, mountain goat grease is added, and then bearberries; it is usually about two o'clock in the afternoon before the meal is ready. The guests are summoned and the food given them, the chiefs, as usual, receiving more than those of lower rank. After eating they disperse to await the evening rites. [251] [252] [554]

It was impossible to obtain an accurate account of the ritual carried out on the evening of this, the first day of the potlatch proper. The ceremonial was of less importance than those preceding and following, and it has long fallen into disuse. The guests take up their accustomed places, and the Bella Coola members of the sisook range themselves near them and behind the fire. The corners next the door are occupied by non-members of the society. The singers beat out two of [182] 556* 575 [535]

* 556 the best songs they have made for the initiates, and any of the sisaok members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiates
575 dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no
[535] material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiates, resplendent in sisaok head-dresses, appear at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dance a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a lad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all disperse.

THE POTLATCH: SECOND DAY

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(1) Communication to the foreign guests of the new sisaok
[553] names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(2) Payment to X by the members of his wife's family of the goods necessary to rebuy her from her husband.

During the Evening

(3) Repayment by X of debts owed to members of his own village.

(4) Return of a dead relative of X to visit the living.

(5) Distribution of presents to validate this appearance.

(6) In some cases, dancing by some of the sisaok initiates.

Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a wash-
[575] basin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up,
[574] and towards noon all of those invited reassemble in his house. Three river canoes have been brought in and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. Boxes containing large quantities of red elderberries and olachen

* 556 184 ings to reward carpenters and others who had helped X prepare for his potlatch, but in Bella Coola this was usually done the following night.

* 556 769 Now comes what the Bella Coola regard as the most important feature of the potlatch.[20] The singers strike up one of the songs of a senior sisaok, perhaps a siki chosen for his skill in acting. As he dances, clad in his ceremonial costume and head-dress, whistling is heard without the house. A number of sisaok are making the noise and they modulate it so that it appears to draw nearer and nearer. This is effected either with whistles of different sizes or by blowing harder. The dancer rushes out of the house. The whistling continues in a series of short bursts, as if a conversation were being carried on in that language. The sisaok or siki returns, and the audience, silenced by the mystery of the affair, listens to his explanation:

"It is so-and-so," he announces, using the ancestral name of one of X's deceased relatives. "The crest has come to pay his son [or whatever relation X may be to him] a visit. I will bring him in."

While he speaks, continuous whistling is heard from without, but when he leaves the house it once more takes on the form of a dialogue. Presently he returns, followed by a masked figure in the centre of a group of members of the sisaok society. If the deceased's first ancestor had been an eagle, in that guise the figure will appear—an eagle mask on his head, and his whole body, except perhaps the feet, covered by a large blanket thickly covered with eagle down and furnished with painted wooden wings. The dancer is usually entirely blinded by this costume, but he is guided by a number of the sisaok whose presence is attributed to the necessity for guarding and paying honour to the supernatural visitor. Among those who accompany him there is always a man with a whistle, the note of which simulates the cry of an eagle, and this is sounded at intervals. The actor bends in imitation of a bird and shakes himself, lifting his head and opening the movable beak by means of a hidden string, while the whistle sounds. Then he stoops down and hops a few steps eagle fashion. Slowly, with pauses and turnings around, the figure circles the fire and retires through the front door, always attended by a number of sisaok. The actor displays considerable dramatic ability, and the performance is strikingly effective in the large, plank-built house, illumined only by a smoky central fire which casts flickering shadows over the intently watching audience. The dogs, alone unimpressed by the solemnity of the occasion, skulk to and fro. 556* 769 535 575 [532]

If a whale is represented, a large wooden frame-work is carried by several men who walk inside of it. Raven, bear, or other animals may also be used, according to the ancestral myth of the deceased. Some of the first people came to this earth as men, but there have always been a sufficient number of intermarriages to permit everyone to portray some bird or beast, obtained from the family into which an ancestor married. A supernatural object claimed to have been seen by a forefather can also be used on these occasions. In some cases a composite figure is used. Such may have the head of an eagle, a killer whale projecting from the back, and a raven on its chest. In such a case those three creatures have been connected with the ancestry of the deceased, and his spirit is believed to have assumed those forms. Great individual choice is allowed in such matters. [532] [532] [532] [184]

If several of X's deceased relatives are being commemorated, the sound of whistling is again heard from without, a short time after the departure of the first masked figure. A senior sisaok goes out, and the same ritual is repeated. This time the masked actor represents some other bird or animal. Three, or in some cases four, dead people are thus shown, though one is more customary. The actual management of the figures is left to the direction of the carpenters who have made them. Often a foreign workman is employed, as a mark of respect for his skill. In spite of all precautions there are often delays about the final preparations, especially with regard

*556 769 [575] [535] to a complicated figure such as a whale, and in that case an expert dancer among the guests is called upon to perform. It is announced that this is, "to make clean the road for the dead."

After each masked figure has disappeared, the sound of whistling from without grows gradually weaker, as the apparition returns whence it came. In solemn silence X takes a copper[21] which he has had in readiness, breaks it across his knee,[22] and throws it either into the fire or down on the ground in the track that the figure has taken. Then the announcer calls out loudly:

"It is for his crest.[23] It has 'made bone for the dead.'" Then he continues, speaking for X and using the first person:

"My heart is glad at seeing my father.[24] At death he returned back on the path of my family's ancestors and donned our ancient crest. He now lives in Nusmät·a, whence he came to visit us and whither he has now gone back."

[178] The significance of the throwing down of a copper is entirely unknown to the modern Bella Coola, although they still perform the ritual. In some vague way it is felt that "bone," which may imply stability, has been provided for the deceased. The act thus appears in the light of an offering to the dead, but this sentiment is not clearly appreciated by the participants in the rite; the present has been made for, rather than to, the one being mourned.

The copper, now valueless, is picked up by any chief and given to a poor man.

After a short interval a number of youths begin to distribute presents, provided by X, which have been placed in readiness. Gifts of equal value are given to all foreign male guests; while the women receive ones less valuable. These presents are strictly non-returnable, being regarded as "eagle down,"[a] and having, therefore, a ceremonial significance. They validate and mark the importance of the representation just displayed. They are spoken of as having been shaken off by the deceased as he departed to return to his home above. [769] [431]

If there are many sisaok initiates concealed within the back-room, some of them may now be called upon to dance, but usually this is reserved for the following night. Unless some of those secluded are going to dance, food is distributed and all disperse. [575] [535]

THE POTLATCH: THIRD DAY

This is the day when presents are given and, with the previous, is the most important of the whole ceremonial. The following are its features.

During the Day

(1) Distribution of much food, and sometimes of insults to the guests by excessive presents, or by the destruction of valuables. [578]

During the Evening and Night

(2) Dramatic representation of some object connected with X's ancestral myth.

(3) Distribution of presents by X to recompense the craftsmen who have assisted in the potlatch.

(4) Repayments by X of gifts received at previous potlatches.

(5) Giving of presents by X to some of his guests.

(6) Distribution of presents to strengthen X's seat.

(7) Distribution of presents to strengthen, or establish, seats for a number of young men.

(8) Dancing of the sisaok initiates. 556*

(9) Distribution of presents to recompense those who have assisted the sisaok dancers. 575

(10) Distribution of presents to validate the sisaok dances and the names thereby acquired by the initiates.

success, according to the Bella Coola, depends upon the goods expended in their establishment (I, p. 261).

556* 575 535

Throughout all this ceremonial the initiates have been carefully concealed in the back-room. They are now eagerly, though with trepidation, awaiting their time to dance. The order of appearance is a matter of no importance. It is arranged by the singers, who send word to one of the initiates and then begin to beat out one of his songs. He emerges, clad in a ceremonial blanket, wearing a sisaok head-dress, and holding a rattle in his hand. Taking up his station behind the fire he dances in time to the beating of sticks. As he does so, the speaker calls upon X's wife to bring forward goods as "cedar-bark mats for him to stand upon," or "cedar-bark mats to make soft his seat." These are piled at some convenient spot. After dancing, the initiate retires to the back-room, accompanied by one of the older members of the sisaok society, perhaps a siki. This man presently emerges, saying:

"It is most peculiar. An eagle is there now."[38]

At the same time a whistle sounds from the back-room, in imitation of the scream of an eagle.

There ensues a constant interplay of remarks between the heralds and those regulating the ceremony. One of the former may call out:

"Let us see it."

The elder returns to the back-room, saying, "I will bring it out."

There now emerges a figure masked to represent an eagle, or whatever bird or animal it may be, with a long blanket covering all but the feet. Any clever dancer is employed to wear this disguise, seldom the initiate himself. The "eagle" bends down beside the singers as if whispering a song to them, though in reality they have themselves composed it. They sing this as the masked figure moves around the fire, imitating the gait of an eagle with considerable dramatic skill, while an

556 assistant blows a whistle, sounding like an eagle. When the 575 figure has disappeared into the back-room, the heralds discuss with one another in a loud tone of voice how that was the form [535] in which the initiate's ancestor appeared long ago. At the present time there is uncertainty concerning the proper ritual connected with the appearance of the tutwinam at this juncture.

A senior sisaok then calls on X to bring forward goods, "to shield our eyes from the supernatural being." These articles, part of which may have been provided by relatives of the initiate, are piled beside those brought forward by X's wife, which may also have come from the same source.

The two assortments of goods are now distributed. First, those provided by X are presented to the singers who composed [465] the songs for the initiates, to the carpenters who made the masks, the heralds, and announcers, and any others who have assisted; if any remain they are presented to the stranger-guests. Then the goods which are "mats for the dancer's feet" are distributed, entirely to the guests, and are said to have "become nothing" or to have "flowed away" in the transaction. Neither set of goods is returnable. These presents validate in the eyes of the guests, the right of the initiate to membership in the sisaok society.

Then a second, third, or fourth neophyte is called out, one at a time, and the same procedure is repeated.[11] In distributing the goods, efforts are made to remember those guests who received nothing at the first distribution.

Toward dawn, one of the important chiefs, it is immaterial which one, calls out:

"I want a siki."

[789] It is understood that for this part of the ceremony a foreign expert is required, and one such comes forward according to previous arrangement. He retires to the back-room and re-

expenditure though he must forgo the prestige enjoyed by a man who has been able to elevate his professional names in a lavish manner. Selection is a constant factor in the social life of a Bella Coola; the man who uses all his wealth to acquire a firm seat cannot be "strong" in sisaok matters; the man who desires to specialize in kusiut affairs cannot afford to display an elaborate totem-pole. Amid these conflicting desires, it often happens that a man somewhat neglects his professional prerogatives, especially those of which the dignity has been slightly lessened through superior skill shown by individuals endowed with no more than native ability. Upstarts of this kind have always infringed upon professional dignity, and the coming of the white man has added a new factor which has almost destroyed vocational prerogatives.

A'alk Dances

The most important, as well as the most spectacular, dances that occur at potlatches are those given by members of the sisaok society. In addition to these, a feature of many potlatches is the performance of a'alk dances.[1] As already mentioned, from 1870 onwards there have been many changes in sisaok ritual; new elements have been acquired by the marriages of Bella Coola to members of the coastal tribes, with the result that details of procedure vary at every ceremony according to the prerogatives of the donor. Since 1910, the influence of white civilization has increased to such an extent that sisaok ceremonials have virtually been abandoned. This took place at a time when the ritual was in transition, a state of affairs which rendered difficult the collection of coherent information. A'alk dances are associated with sisaok, but the addition of new features to the latter was accompanied by a decay of the former. Both societies have now almost ceased to exist, but whereas the sisaok organization was abandoned during a period of change and accretion, that 177 of the a'alk came to an end when it was already waning in 535 importance. It was impossible to obtain as much detailed 575 information about the latter as was desired, and it is even 128 possible that some of the facts recorded in connection with nuaak ceremonial really belong to a'alk rites.

The right to perform an a'alk dance depends upon a duly 424 validated ancestral prerogative of which the obvious mark is 535 an a'alk name. Some of the first people brought down such 575 designations and dances with them from above in the beginning of time, a few were acquired on this earth as gifts from super-
[773] natural beings. Those who have rights of this kind form a loose organization which may be termed the a'alk society. This is closely associated both with the nuaak society and with chiefs, owing to the occurrence of these three types of names in the same ancestral myths. One member of an ancestral [556] family may use his goods to validate his ancestral name, another to make himself a nuaak, a third to become an a'alk, and an important chief, endowed with ability and wealth, may be able to do all three.

A'alk dances are less spectacular than those of either the nuaak or kuxiut societies, nor are rattles or whistles used. The prerogatives of a member are limited to his name, the right to perform a certain dance, and the use of a song which commonly describes some feature of his ancestral myth. Four types of dances are considered to be a'alk; the methods of acquiring and using any one of these are similar, so it is unnecessary to describe the differences before the actual account of the performance of each.

556 If there is a dormant a'alk prerogative in the ancestral 575 family of the donor of a potlatch, he usually chooses to validate this as one of the features of his ceremony. He first consults his wife and other relatives to ensure that sufficient goods will be forthcoming, and if this matter can be arranged satisfactorily, he chooses some young relative as the recipient of the dormant right. It would be most unusual for the youth selected to decline the honour. Or some man, other than the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and 556 requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. 575 Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do.

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme [533] always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The 532 carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or 556 sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either 575 human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family.

On the night of sldstnum, when the work for the potlatch is 556 allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined 575 within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the nuuk initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the sisi, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with [184] the type worn by nuuk, one of the many points of resemblance [535]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

552 575 [184] [292] [535] between the two societies. Presently the elderly a'alk returns, clad in his ceremonial costume consisting of the head-gear, a blanket, and a narrow apron from which hang deer hooves, small pieces of copper, or other jingling articles. The singers strike up his song, and he dances near the fire in a manner depending upon which of the four dances he has the right to perform. Again the siki leaves the house; when he returns he announces that a tutwinam is coming with a song for the youth, naming the one who is to be made an a'alk. A moment passes, and in stalks a masked figure depicting the form taken by the first ancestor of the novice, or the being from which one of his later forefathers received an a'alk prerogative. Sometimes two of these beings appear. The apparition circles the fire, stops beside the singers, and chants a song to them in a low voice. Then it enters the back-room and is seen no more. Presently the singers strike up the song they have just heard. To those who are neither a'alk nor sisook it seems that the song was brought by the supernatural visitor; in reality, it is the one previously composed by the singers and taught by them to the wearer of the mask to lend realism to the performance. The youth concealed within the back-room does not emerge on this occasion, the song is merely sung in practice. Sometimes the masked figure appears during the daytime and walks openly along the shore of the river like a foreign guest, as indeed it is said to be.

[184] [178] The coming of a tutwinam is one of the points of resemblance between a'alk and sisook rites. The older people agree that this has long been a feature of the former society, adopted by the latter in recent years. The description given in this section appears to be of the original and proper use, although, as already noted, the sisook have recently employed tutwinam for somewhat different purposes.

It is uncertain whether or not the a'alk novice remains secluded any longer within the back-room. In ancient times he probably did, but with the recent growth of the sisook society and decline of the a'alk, concealment has become limited to initiates of the former organization.

No more a'alk dances take place during the potlatch preliminaries, but with the coming of the first group of foreign guests, the host displays as many types of dance as he is entitled to, including a'alk if he has the necessary prerogative. On this occasion other a'alk, especially relatives of the donor, give their dances, the only time that such are used at potlatches except by novices receiving names. This is repeated on the arrival of every party of guests.

Meanwhile the novice, or novices, has been practising the proper steps for his appearance, which always occurs immediately before the entry of the masked figure representing the donor's dead relative. As already mentioned, there are four kinds of a'alk dances, known as nusqwal,[1] llaiyākam, qi'aqa, and am'lel-a. A similar song is used for a dancer of any one of these four; the text describes some small incident of the ancestral myth in which the name occurs, such as the bringing down of the prerogative by the first incumbent in the beginning of time. At the proper moment, the singers beat this out and the audience joins them in singing it. Then the singers begin to strike rapidly on the floor with double beats, assisted by the guests who clap their hands in rapid couplets. Out comes the dancer, resplendent in his head-dress decorated with weasel skins, and women with the required prerogative begin to drone. If his prerogative is as a llaiyākam or qi'aqa, he proceeds to a place beside the fire and begins to run around it, sunwise, in short mincing steps, revolving at the same time on himself. He clasps his hands behind his back and bends down, then stands upright with palms extended upwards, never ceasing to move his feet in rapid steps. This type of dance is far more violent than a susask one, and the amount of energy expended by a dancer in his rapid circuits of the fire is tremendous. Never, even for a moment, are his feet quiet, while his body twists and bends in an amazing fashion. After two

[1]Among the supernatural beings, the nusqwal is a yearling mountain goat. [776]

556 or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The time beaten 575 out for a nusqwal or am'lel·a dancer is the same. He too comes 535 near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the [533] singers in unison bellow out, Wai··, "More." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clutched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the beating becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of Wai··, and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Here he revolves once more in the same furious fashion; the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Nusqwal and am'lel·a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience. This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

574 The occasion on which importance and solemnity are 575 attached to a'alk dances is during potlatches, but they are
535 also given at other times. Most Bella Coola performances are so steeped in the presence of the supernatural that the element of enjoyment is secondary, but in the spring, after the [796] end of the kusiut season and before the salmon come to the rivers, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A susaok can call his fellows to his house and the singers beat out susaok songs to which the owners dance, but the most common hosts are a'alk. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the heralds invite the guests in his a'alk name. Those summoned include both members of the society

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

and those who are not. Any a'alk, provided that he has enough food for a meal, can call in his neighbours, but the one who usually does so is a man who has received his name a year or two before the occasion. 574 575 535

A few days before the time selected, the host asks the singers to compose a new song for him. For a nusqwal dancer particularly, and in some cases for any one of the other three divisions of the society, the text does not deal with incidents connected with the host's ancestral story, but with humorous or disgraceful incidents of the present time. If a man has caught ten salmon and kept them all for himself, his miserliness is commented upon in the song; if a wife has deserted her husband for another man, the actions of the two are mercilessly ridiculed; if a chief has failed to display generosity it is likewise recorded, and reference is made to errors in dance ritual. To do this is one of the functions of a nusqwal, and the singers are always ready to assist him. At the same time they often add a new incident to the tune belonging to some other a'alk dancer so that he too will be able to perform. In this way the airs are remembered from year to year, which is different from the customary Bella Coola usage. 575 574 535 533 [626]

On the morning of the day chosen, the host asks one of the singers to beat a drum repeatedly but slowly, as a signal that a non-ceremonial dance is about to take place. About noon, heralds go from house to house announcing who is to give the dance. In the late afternoon the people gather in the donor's house where men, women, and children seat themselves without distinction of rank, the only reserved place being that for the singers behind the fire. They beat out the host's tune and he dances to it, while the singers themselves sing the words to the amusement of the audience. Using their own discretion, they then beat out the tune of another a'alk and he also dances, followed in succession by a third, a fourth, and as many as the singers think fit. Sometimes the songs of sisaok are used in a similar manner. When many have danced, the host distributes food to all his guests, not forgetting to give the largest [202] [203]

presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the sisaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqwal for his name Sinxälotla which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tłaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuxetł (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Tłaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[1] long, long ago, Älquntäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sinxan·a, and a mortal; so he

539 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Älkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Älkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anokokwäls was a good place for a ceremony because Älkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[11] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Älkwi danced [535] a nusqwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nusqwal dance.

In later years, Älkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that [551] by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest brother the name, Nustakwalämi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Älkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcopinätl, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcopinätl, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the sisaok, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[12] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural

[532] [11] These paintings are said to be still in existence, and the sister of one informant claimed to have seen them.

[12] This point is elaborated in vol. II, chap. 1.

he can. Several of the older people mentioned that early white traders would have received more for their goods by giving them away than by selling. 556 431

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to sisaok, a'alk, or even kusiut. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small. 556 648 [484]

Although the most important Bella Coola dances are performed at potlatches or during the kusiut season, they are not confined to these periods. Professional singers do nothing else and, except during the run of salmon when everyone is busy fishing, a dance occurs every few nights. Supernatural beings are not called down; consequently there is little solemnity and everyone has a good time. On these occasions, kusiut songs are first beaten out, followed by sisaok and a'alk, and the owner 533 535 574

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

533. of each song dances to it. Anyone who has enough food to 535 provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such 574 an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs
[203] there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and [626] call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the [203] initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of [221] salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one 796 of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in the fishing. In the early autumn, when ber-
556 ries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn 796 to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign [221] guests, calls in his neighbours for a susaok dance and initiates
575 some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual, 535 described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village [426] at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during [575] the early autumn, while in winter kusiut dances take place [535] almost nightly. When they are over, it is time for the non-sacred variety of a'alk performances, and for another type of rite, nusäxkämx.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

rite, nusäxkämx. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and indebtedness. February is the proper month for nusäxkämx, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use some of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a nusäxkämx dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a nusäxkämx name is not embodied in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Ṭopiwac, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Qolon, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

852 principal instructors, aided by the professional musicians.
867 Boys are always willing to act as singers for the practice they [533] receive, and the gifts they will acquire. Other lads are chosen to act as heralds, an effort being made in each case to pick those likely to pursue these professions.

[796] The day finally selected for the ceremony is in February, on a date when nothing of importance is taking place. The juvenile heralds summon the child guests, who have been invited in accordance with the rules governing a potlatch, especial care being taken to omit none to whom the child donor is indebted. His father carefully instructs him in this matter, thus impressing on his son's mind one of the fundamental points of Bella Coola life. In the late afternoon, when all have [535] assembled, the boy singers beat out the donor's song and he dances to it. It may be in the nature of a sisaok, a'alk, or kusiut dance, according to the wishes of his parents. In many cases, one of the grandparents or some other old relative likewise dances to the song, using whatever style he chooses. There is no ceremonial significance to the ceremony and all enjoy themselves immensely, especially the adult guests. After
[553] the dancing, the new name is announced and presents are given to the guests. The father of the young donor carefully instructs him as to the scale of his gifts, emphasizing the necessity of rewarding the singers and heralds, and of repaying with interest those children from whom he has received favours. In this way, the ceremony serves as a practical example of how to conduct a potlatch. The parents of the donor always provide some tasty food for the occasion, and this is distributed after [556] the gifts have been handed round. The necessity for food and presents makes it impossible for any but the children of chiefs to enjoy this training.

After the ceremony, the children parade up and down the sidewalk in front of the houses, singing boisterously. The performance has been for their benefit and they wish to "show off." One night completes the affair, but the following afternoon another child may summon his comrades to a similar

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

ceremony. The child singers first beat out the song of the present donor, then that of his predecessor, to which the latter dances once again. If food is plentiful, nusäxkämx̣ ceremonies may be carried out every day for several weeks, or a year or two may elapse without one. A child's song is remembered from year to year and he dances whenever it is beaten out. The name acquired in this way is used semi-jocularly by a lad's comrades. After marriage, it is considered unfitting for a youth to be concerned with nusäxkämx̣ and he normally becomes an a'alk.

852 867 [796] [533] [535] [551] [885]

Ceremonies of this kind have been discontinued for many years and it was impossible to obtain detailed accounts. The main features are clear: they served to instruct children in the methods of present-giving. According to one informant, there were two types of nusäxkämx̣ ceremonial; one of the humorous pattern above described in which, however, food alone was given away, and another in which miniature presents were distributed. This man believed that the latter was only possible for the children of wealthy chiefs, and that on such occasions the themes consisted of small incidents in the family myth. In either case, the importance of ceremonial can be judged from the manner in which it was impressed upon mere children.

their craft and set out on foot along the overland path to the head of South Bentinck Arm. 539*

Midway along this trail the travellers saw a house, called Tcäkwalotl because it could lengthen itself at will. From this supernatural sight each of the five became a shaman. This house was a replica of the one above in which mankind was made and, like it, contained many rooms, in each of which lived an individual speaking a different language. Äl·imulsaix failed to understand them and in his annoyance scattered the speakers, who fled to different parts of the coast where each increased and perpetuated his own language. This is why the various coastal tribes have their own tongues; if Äl·imulsaix had been able to understand them in Tcäkwalotl there would be no diversity of speech now. [829]

Various dances were taking place in the rooms within the house. There was a constant din from the large whistles used in sisaok ceremonial which sounded of their own accord and were continually answered by Echo. Only at this place and at Nusqalst did Echo appear to the first people; hence only the descendants of Äl·imulsaix and of the Nusqalst people have the right to portray him in their dances. Äno°likwolsaix (II, p. 8) stood near the door; when at last she called out, the sisaok whistles became silent as if in fear. [424] [535]

Continuing their journey the travellers reached Täl·io, at the head of South Bentinck Arm, where a solitary man, Nusxemda, was living. At this place Ťlakwakilayekwa gave birth to Raven, who was born as a boy with the legs of a raven. Äl·imulsaix named him ixlqotlamsqwaxdjinas. After a short sojourn at Täl·io they ascended the river, and presently Äl·imulsaix saw a female grizzly bear, whom he also invited to join the party as his sister. The bear accepted and he endeavoured to change the creature to a woman. He had fair success with the paws and face; that is why these parts of a bear are similar to those of men at the present day, but the beast's hairy hide defied his efforts and in disgust he told it to run away. Before banishing it, he bade the animal always show a friendly disposition to human beings, wherefore grizzly bears at Täl·io have never been known to attack a person. The party proceeded up the river to Mount Stap', where Äl·imulsaix found a repository (II, p. 8) through the discovery of which he became a Cannibal with the name Snunikka°kis and an eagle as incubus. From this point they returned to Täl·io, where they settled permanently. [825]

Many of the names which occur in this myth are still in use. Mrs. Schooner's designation as chief is Ťlakwakilayekwa, a name that can be used by either man or woman; in the former case the suffix yekwa is 551

presents were distributed to validate the name, Ťlaiyākam, which Sinuxetl had chosen for himself. 539*

Sinuxetl married a Bella Bella woman who brought with her the prerogative of a dance with respect to the devil-fish. In Bella Bella this rite was connected both with the kusiut and the sisaok, but in Kimsquit it was performed only as a kusiut dance. It was first given there by Łulqwan·i, a relative of Sinuxetl, and has since been performed in like fashion in Kimsquit. Their daughter received the Bella Bella name, Xelāsu, which has since remained in Kimsquit. [424] [575] [535] [551]

ORIGIN MYTH OF Āxet·i[40]

In the beginning of time there came to Āxet·i, on the east side of the Dean River, about one mile from the sea, Sonxwāāks and his three younger brothers. They brought a stone hammer as their present from Ālquntām. After they had lived some time on this earth, Sonxwāāks asked Yulātimut to have a canoe ready for him on the morrow. By the next day Yulātimut had completed a fine craft. Sonxwāāks was delighted and spent four days fitting it out; then set out with his three younger brothers for a trip to the far north, where he knew by report that abalone-shells were to be found.[41] The four did not know the route and were constantly penetrating into fiords from which there was no exit; however, they persevered and were helped by all whom they encountered, Sonxwāāks's name being well known. After a month's voyage, they reached their goal. They found themselves before a lofty precipice falling sheer into the ocean with a cavern visible in it at very low tide. This they boldly entered. At first they were deluged with falling star-fish; in fact, their canoe would have been sunk by the weight of these if the youngest brother had not held up his cedar-bark cloak to ward them off. A little farther on they found countless abalone-shells, with which they swiftly filled the canoe, fearing lest the tide should rise sufficiently to prevent their return if they stayed to investigate further. Once safely outside they camped, and the eldest brother took the opportunity to bestow names on the younger brothers for things they had seen or done on the way. He called his second brother Nuswin·āmx, "The Warrior," as if he had fought against the abalone; the third Ālus·limān, "Falling Star-Fish," and the youngest Ālusqox, "The Roof-Maker," a reference to the [40]Related by Jim Pollard. Boas (p. 60), has recorded a similar myth from Bella Coola with different characters.

[41]The Bella Coola are emphatic in stating that abalone-shell comes from the north or the east; possibly this may be explained by an indirect trade route. [487]

make a salmon-weir. In accordance with Ālquntām's instruction, Smaoan planned to make a circuit of the world seeking a suitable place to settle. He started northward, in eagle form, scattering eagle down, wherefore this material has ever since been highly regarded and is used as a symbol of peace. Owing, moreover, to the eagle down scattered on the mountains, there has always been much snow in that region.[12] 539* [778] [821]

Sometimes as he travelled he assumed the form of the sun, for he was so powerful that nothing was impossible to him. Far in the north Smaoan obtained an enormous copper, which he carried back to Kimsquit without completing his original plan of circling the earth. He perched on a tree near his brother's almost completed salmon-weir.

"Why don't you change yourself to a human being?" Omqomkilıka inquired.

"I am waiting until our food is more plentiful," Smaoan replied. "Besides I have been to the far north where I obtained an enormous copper."

When the weir was completed and Omqomkilıka was catching many salmon, his brother at last decided to become a man. But instead of sending his cloak back above he animated it, as an eagle. Smaoan now became an ardent fisherman and was much annoyed by the thefts made by the bird, though he himself was responsible for it not having returned to Nusmät·a. After about a year he suggested to Omqomkilıka that they should kill it, but the latter demurred, since it was the guise which Ālquntām had given Smaoan. The latter said nothing, but the next time he saw the eagle stealing his fish he killed the bird, without consulting his brother. No sooner had he done this than he felt sorry, but it was too late; he could not restore the eagle to life.

Owing to the salmon given them by Ālquntām the two brothers were now very prosperous, and Smaoan began to think of marriage. One day he noticed some chips floating down the Dean River, so he judged that people must be living on that stream. He set out to investigate, met Yeālos, and married his sister Sximāna, as has been described in a Dean River myth. To celebrate this event the two brothers prepared to invite people from far and near. First they lengthened their house to accommodate a large number; it was of the type known as tcäkwalotl, though it could not expand without human agency. Then they painted their spoons with designs of the mätsqus, since they had brought that creature with them from above. Now everything was ready and they summoned their guests. When all had assembled, Smaoan gave a Hlaiyäkam dance [424] [535]

[12] The clouds which float over Kimsquit before a west wind are still called "Smaoan's clouds," in memory of his journey. The myth fails to explain how Smaoan was responsible for these phenomena.

* 539 to commemorate the killing of the eagle. The text of his song described how he had come to this earth and how he had slain the bird which had [424] been his own cloak. This dance was duly validated by presents of [535] salmon, and has since been carried out by the descendants of Smaoan. It is assumed that the concept of such a dance was given to him by Ālquntām before he left Nusmāt·a, but he used his own discretion on this earth as to the actual reason for it.

At this gathering of people, virtually a potlatch, Smaoan took for himself the name Ānuqplālaix, "What Fills People." He chose this name with reference to the countless salmon caught in his weir.

Smaoan next travelled to Bella Bella seeking a wife. His fame and wealth were so well known that he was able to wed Ťlākwaitl, the daughter of a powerful chief. She had the valued prerogative of wailing, a right which had been duly validated by presents. Her father told her that when she was going with Smaoan to Kimsquit she would pass Yuyulmxl, a man who had been turned to stone on the skyline above the western side of Dean Channel, about five miles from its head, and that unless she wailed as she passed him her children would be unable to enjoy this prerogative. The reason for this injunction is not now understood; it is merely recognized that as Yuyulmxl became petrified near Smaoan's home he became, in some manner, a crest. As the canoe bearing Ťlākwaitl passed Yuyulmxl she began to wail and weep, nor could her husband soothe her. He, for his part, told the herald, Nuslliuq, who had come with him from above, to call out as follows:

"Hello! Crest, our chief has married a Bella Bella woman; as you are his crest, so are you hers."

[484] When Nuslliuq had called this a second time the stone man answered. [763] Ever since, passers-by have addressed Yuyulmxl, and a failure on his part to reply is considered an omen of death.

Ťlākwaitl brought her husband several valuable prerogatives, a sisaok dance with the large cone-shaped whistles, several kusiut dance rights, as well as some dyed cedar-bark. According to one of Smaoan's descendants, this is how the sisaok ritual reached Kimsquit. Among the Bella Bella, whales can only be eaten by chiefs, and Smaoan received this right from his father-in-law. The latter also gave his son-in-law a dead whale, which was towed behind the canoe towards Kimsquit. Smaoan knew that his people would object to it being brought into the river, since there was a firm belief that a whale would drive away the salmon. Accordingly, he beached the carcass in the fiord and there dried the meat in smoke.

Smaoan now determined to give an elaborate potlatch at which he planned to portray his prerogative with regard to the whale. He decided to build his new house of the semi-subterranean type; when it was finished 584 ceived information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. Her mother and father weigh the suitor's [581] eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral possessions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number 583 of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are 584 termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish giving. If X's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If 556 X's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, pre- 584 sently invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. ●535 The singers, in their usual stations behind the fire, strike up 575 the tune of some kusiut and the owner of the song, thus warned, dances in time to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for kusiut after kusiut, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the tune of one susaok after another, and each member of that society gives his dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents [583] of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the rite gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will later be remembered in connection with it.

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments, but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may omit the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a kusiut dance,[3] or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children [858] who may result from it.

583 584

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and often intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. Anyone having the necessary financial ability 585 In the gathering dusk all assemble in X's house; Y's relatives attend or not as they wish. X's father would feel insulted if anyone else should stay away without a valid excuse, but in point of fact everyone is eager for an evening's entertainment. The singers take their accustomed places behind the fire and the guests arrange themselves in the house without reference to rank. The musicians strike up the kusiut song of anyone present, and the person so indicated dances. The first tune used is frequently that of X's father, and then that of his mother, but there is no fixed rule about this. The singers [535] choose and beat out tune after tune, and guest after guest dances, but, since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is of a non-sacred nature. After exhausting the most popular kusiut songs, the musicians beat out the susaok songs of many of the guests who, in succession, dance to them; the songs of shamans are used in like fashion. Sometimes the singers continue until everyone present has danced, at other times they curtail the ceremony, as they think fit. When they decide to stop, they intimate this to X's father, who superintends the distribution to the guests of whatever kind of food has been provided.

During the meal, a fluent speaker stands up and expounds 537 on behalf of X's father the ancestral myth in which his son's 585 ancestral name is embodied. Sometimes X's father acts as his own orator, but usually a herald is called upon. Only sufficient [203] details are given to show the importance of X. The myth may either be one of the most ancient type dealing with the first settlement of this earth, or one of later date describing the exploits of X's famous ancestors; but in either case, as shown by the examples given in the last chapter, each contains an account of a marriage. It is always known, although not generally described, that at each of these several dancers performed, their number varying between two and eighteen. The orator, when outlining the myth, stresses this part of it, and always announces how many danced at that time; with the statement that there will be a like number on the morrow. In the same manner the fluent speaker outlines a myth belonging to the ancestral family of X's mother, again with emphasis on the dancers used by her ancestors. X, as a member of both ancestral families, can combine his rights from both sides, but it is customary for him to use no more than five or six performers. Should X have no claim to this privilege from either mother or father, an almost unthinkable situation, he is able to borrow the prerogative of using some from friends. The sentiment on which this oration of myths is based is the one so often mentioned; it marks the close relationship between the future children and their noble ancestors of old, a source of strength to the former. 537 585 [426]

X's father now names those whom he wishes to assist him on the following day. These are the dancers, who are chosen primarily for their skill in dancing, and secondarily in accordance with their rank. With them he selects a number of persons to stand near and help or "cherish" them as they perform. He also asks the services of some of the women who are professional droners; of the keeper of the marriage song of his ancestral family; and, finally, of a number of men to sit near the singers and assist them with suggestions. It would be most exceptional for anyone so called upon to decline the honour. It is near morning by this time and the guests depart. 585 [595] [614]

On the following morning, the actual wedding day, X's father calls to his house those selected the previous evening as dancers and their assistants. The former wear blankets decorated with small copper ornaments[6] and carry circular wooden rattles provided with handles. Their clothing and rattles may be their own, but if they do not possess suitable attire, it is incumbent on X's father to provide them. Skins are piled up within the house, and some of these are said to "make soft the [534]

[6]At the present time there is uncertainty as to the proper clothing of a marriage dancer. Several informants stated that it was a copper-decorated blanket, whereas others said that there was no special attire; one man claimed that an attempt was made to imitate the form and costume of X's first ancestor, and another that camel costume was used. Probably there was no uniformity in custom. [292] [535] [184]

585 handles of the rattles"; symbolizing that they are pads to protect the hands, though the dancers derive no benefit from the pelts, which are stacked with others for later distribution to Y's family. A large amount of provisions has been prepared and placed in boxes, one for each member of Y's family. In many cases it is difficult to estimate how much food will be required, and if there is a surplus, it is eaten by the performers and other assistants.

When all are ready they rush forth; dancers, dancers' assistants, and young relatives of X; children more prominently by his father. The rest of the villagers watch with interest, but do not take part in the ceremony. Choosing a position outside Y's house, the singers beat the time of the marriage [533] song used by X's ancestors; if the words are known they sing [424] them. Like the prerogative of marriage dancers, there may [424] not be a marriage song embodied in every origin myth, but if X lacks such he is usually able to borrow one.* The keeper of the song is stationed near the singers, ready to help them with the words or the tune, if necessary. Meanwhile the [535] dancers are performing on the sidewalk outside Y's house. Each uses whatever type of dance he chooses, hamat, nawl, a'alt, or even shaman's, but all dance simultaneously, though without paying greater attention to each other than is necessary to avoid collisions. The professional drummers ac- [533] company the singing with their high-pitched quaver.

Meanwhile Y's father, surrounded by his relatives and friends, waits in readiness within their house. Y herself is

*The reputed origin of marriage songs has been described in vol. I, chap. vi. They are less strongly preserved as prerogatives than some elements of origin myths; in fact some keepers of the songs are willing to perform at any wedding, although this may be a modern development. The keeper, either man or woman, is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family, after discussion with the singers. It is his duty to remember text and tune, and the only pecuniary advantage is from the presents made by those to whom he teaches it. Some songs have words, others only a tune. The text of a song brought down by Alquantun to Snaik'a'ia:

"Hello, Snaik'a'ia! We do as we have done before. Please make good the path for those who are about to marry."

Alquantun obtained this song from his heavenly ancestor and used it at his own marriage, as his male descendants have since done.

ciety. These are given several times, serving to recall the 533 ceremonies in which the chief took part during his life. At 575 intervals, the new song is repeated and nuxsk members of the 766 audience join in as they become familiar with the words. Frequently one or more relatives of the deceased dance in his [535] stead during the singing. The details of this rite, especially of the songs used at it, differ considerably according to the actions of the person during life; if a mighty chief, the donor of many potlatches, this fact is described in the song, whereas only an incident from the ancestral myth can be used for a young nuxsk. Many of his female relatives are professional [767] wailers, they function during the ceremony. In all circumstances, the rite aims to comfort the grieving kinsmen, an end which it usually achieves.

As already described, nuxsk ceremonial was in a state of 575 transition at the time of the coming of the white man. Pre- 766
vious to that date, a spectacular funeral prerogative had been 177 adopted from Rivers Inlet,[1] which has since been claimed by a 424 number of nuxsk. All the Bella Coola know of this ceremony, [178] and most of them desire to perform it at the death of a dearly loved relative; at the present time this is possible owing to the slight regard paid to prerogatives, but it is certain that a few years ago it would have been forbidden to most people, and that it was never a universal Bella Coola rite.

When this rite is performed, the corpse is allowed to remain 575
in its coffin for at least one night after the day on which 766 Mulukila came and the nuxsk songs were sung. Meanwhile 532 the carpenters have prepared an imitation body, usually of rags on a light framework, and a wooden representation of the deceased's crest. Since this figure is to come through the roof and carry aloft the corpse, stout hooks are attached to its feet. In theory, the bird or animal disguise used by the first ancestor

[1] One old Bella Coola stated that this prerogative was obtained during his own lifetime from a Rivers Inlet chief who moved to Tal'ds. It is impossible to state accurately when this chief was adopted by the Bella Coola, though it is unquestionably of recent origin.

556 will now be the forms of the one who has recently died. As 769 soon as all have taken their places, an eloquent chief whose [537] aid has been requested for the purpose stands up and recounts the donor's ancestral myth in some detail, mentioning the source and meaning of the mourners' marks and the designs of the totem-poles. Then he continues to the effect that the chief will "cry" by relating the history of his ancestors, which is also the history of the journey taken by his kinsman, and that [195] this recital will above him up. The word used for this, snuts- ténkw, is the one commonly employed for raising a heavy burden with the aid of a lever. Then the singers begin to beat [533] out the first of the mourning songs, accompanying it with their voices and assisted by as many of the audience as are familiar with words and tune. Every effort is made to make the singing as impressive as possible to add dignity to the recital of the journey taken by the person who is being commemorated. The guests listen attentively and are suitably impressed by the ancestral history of the donor and his family. All the songs that have been prepared are sung in succession in the same manner. The lack of dancing distinguishes this type of cere-[535] mony from all others and adds somewhat to its impressiveness.

After the last song is the proper time for validating young [424] relatives of the donor as mourners. One of the miniature [425] totem-poles, which are light enough to be carried in the hands, is brought from the back-room and given to the boy on whom this prerogative is being conferred. An eloquent speaker explains the meanings of the designs so displayed and enough of the family's ancestral history to make clear whence, and how, they were obtained. The singers begin to beat time slowly, and the youth endeavours to keep time with his feet, while he continues to hold the pole.

Meanwhile the donor and his immediate relatives have been arranging the piles of presents with the inevitable counting and [537] re-counting. As at a potlatch, a fluent speaker is commissioned to hold up the objects, state whence they have been obtained, expression animated, and, except for his dirty European clothing, he looked and acted like a religious dignitary taking part in an important ceremony, as was indeed the case. While he was speaking there came from without eerie notes of the large, cone-shaped whistles, combined with the yelping scream of an eagle. The effect, even on an audience which knew that these sounds were of human origin, was tremendous. Men and women stiffened in their seats and craned their necks to see what was taking place near the door. A number of the younger men had slipped away during Reuben's singing to help the masked dancer with his disguise. As some of these assistants continued to blow their whistles, others held up blankets to conceal the necessarily clumsy entrance of the performer through the narrow doorway.

These were dropped after a moment, and out into the centre of the open hall bounded a figure covered with a large white sheet so that only his bare feet were visible. On his head was an eagle mask, from the upper part of his back projected a blackfish, while the head of a raven peered forth from his chest. The dancer, Timothy Snow, who had been chosen for his skill in such matters, leapt forward in a crouching attitude and took a few short, mincing steps as if he were a gigantic eagle hopping on the ground. At once the older Bella Coola women began to drone out, "i . . . . ," and continued as long as the performer remained in the hall. He bent down and turned slowly, sunwise, with arms pressed close to his body and neck contracted, then straightened, and took a few more mincing steps, followed by another turn. In this way he moved in a wide, sunwise circle around the hall, avoiding the middle where there would have been a fire in one of the old-fashioned houses. At intervals he raised himself on his toes and slightly spread his arms beneath the sheet, at the same time looking up so that it appeared as if the eagle were rising to gaze at an object in the distance as a sitting bird does so frequently. This brought the raven mask into plain sight. After a survey of this kind, he bent down and ran a few yards more. Alec Davis and two other nuxalk followed the actor, blowing eagle down over him repeatedly. After one circuit of the hall, the performer passed out through the front door, from the vicinity of which was heard once more the large whistles and the screaming of the eagle, both growing less distinct as if the bird were flying away. 769 556* 535●

The wearer of the mask displayed considerable dramatic talent and succeeded in giving a realistic display in spite of the glaring lights which exposed his bare feet and betrayed the human handicraft of the mask in a manner impossible in the native type of house with a single, central fire as the sole illumination. The Carriers had watched the performance with interest, probably tinged with contempt, but to the Bella Coola it was no mere spectacle, it was a religious rite of the highest importance. All the spectators realized that the figure was human, but this seemed inconsequential as they gazed upon the representation of the dead woman in the form of her crests, to which they believed she had been transformed by death. Even the children were silent, and the only sound during the passage was the wailing of a sleepy infant. The eagle crest belonged to Jessie by virtue of membership in the ancestral family descended from her father's first ancestor, traced patrilineally, who had come to earth at Tcimott in the form of this bird. The blackfish was a crest acquired through her mother; the raven represented a copper raven belonging to an ancestral myth of the dying grandchild. In former times, carpenters would have worked for weeks preparing an elaborate composite figure, but Captain Schooner wished no delay in the ceremony for fear of police interference, so that it was necessary to use what masks happened to be in existence and to place them in conjunction by means of the crude white sheet. Jessie had not been initiated into the sisaok society, but no opposition was raised to the use of sisaok whistles both on account of her status as chief, and owing to the influence of her father who, a numitl chief, feared no restrictions and heeded no conventions. Besides, both her brothers were influ- 769 556* 769 556* 424 178 [575] [622]

* 787 Dances portraying supernatural beings, carried out with [535] full vigour until a few years ago, further fostered belief in [781] them among participants and uninitiated alike. Consequently, many of the young and middle-aged men claim to have seen visions similar to those of their elders. The incident already described (I, p. 30) of the stump which was thought to be a grizzly bear is a case in point. On another occasion a young man mentioned casually that a few evenings before he had seen a headless man walking along the road and that, wishing to view the monstrosity more clearly, he had tried unsuccessfully to strike a match. The reason was obvious to him; the power of the supernatural visitor prevented the match from lighting. The man, who was undoubtedly convinced of the apparition, may have seen something, perhaps a whorl of fog, somewhat resembling a headless body. A white man would have con- [154] sidered such a sight impossible and absurd, whereas the Bella Coola felt little surprise at the appearance of such a creature and promptly accepted it for what it seemed to be.

[828] Mental activities as well as optical illusions are likewise ascribed to supernatural agency. These include profound agitations of the mind, and even what a white man would consider a passing thought. For instance, one morning when about to start work, a certain man stated that he would have good fortune during the day, that a dream had foretold it. At the time he was moving to a new house and needed help to shift a heavy stove. During the course of the day a number of white men happened to pass by and stopped to speak to him; the stove was mentioned, they offered to move it for him, and did so easily and quickly.

"There you are," said the man, "I told you I was going to have good fortune today."

On another occasion the same man claimed to have felt that misfortune had happened to him and soon learnt that one of his sons had been arrested on a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. The man affirmed that he had this premonition before being aware of its cause.

occupants of the canoe, heard a roaring noise and saw a fish-weir, similar to those used by the Bella Coola, stretching across Burke Channel, which is about a mile and a half wide at this point. They went close to the beach and a brave man cut a passage through the obstacle. A similar trap was once seen stretching across South Bentinck Arm. 787 * 539

An unusual apparition may be regarded as an omen of death. For example, not many years ago a young half-breed saw a motor-boat moored to the bank of North Bentinck Arm with an eagle seated in the stern. He ran his own motor-boat towards it, but as he approached the eagle became a man. Then as he drew still nearer, never taking his eyes off the other boat, it, with its occupant, sank beneath the water, without leaving so much as a ripple. On relating the incident to his father, the latter recognized it as an omen of death. Six months later the half-breed's sister died, thus confirming her father's prognostication. 787 * 763 [811]

Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate

Experiences such as have been cited in the last section are regarded as of possible, and not infrequent occurrence at the present time. On the other hand, supernatural aid granted to those in misfortune, though it is the theme of many stories, is not considered as likely to happen now. The Bella Coola believe the narratives to be chronicles of actual events, and base their conceptions of many supernatural beings on their characteristics as therein described. There is no ceremonial significance attached to any of these stories; they may be, and are told by anyone, frequently for entertainment. Unquestionably, there is a feeling that the moral brought out in such tales is of value in educating the young people, though this point is never emphasized. 787 * 538 [869]

Supernatural aid granted to an unfortunate person is termed wlokwaladjut. Power so obtained cannot be transmitted by the recipient, although memory of the experience is 787 * [575] [535]

occasionally preserved as the theme of a sisaok dance. The term is also somewhat loosely applied to any instance of supernatural help. The reason for the receipt of power is often attributed to the strong supernatural elements of the favoured one, or to his having made himself agreeable to supernatural beings by the observance of ceremonial chastity or other propitiatory means. A few individuals assert that there is a tendency for supernatural aid to follow certain ancestral families, but such a belief is not general.

The following story is typical of the kind of assistance granted although no clear picture can be presented except through the native medium—a number of different tales, such as are given in the following chapter.

THE GOOD FORTUNE OF 'Yeäxdji

Not long after the earth was first populated there were living at Ḳwiyai, near Namu, two Bella Bella men, Ḳomo'sala and Ḳälkum, with their wives, relatives, and slaves. Ḳomo'sala's son, 'Yeäxdji, fell a victim to the virulent disease, llokulx, which causes the face of the sufferer to swell and his flesh to rot. When the case appeared hopeless, his father called his herald to tell the people to abandon Ḳwiyai, and to leave the dying youth alone. Accordingly they removed the planks from the houses, packed them on canoes with all the food and clothing from the village and went away, leaving the unfortunate 'Yeäxdji alone in his misery. Only an old slave woman took pity on him; before she left she hid some glowing embers with frayed cedar-bark in a large clam-shell and told him where to find them.

'Yeäxdji wept bitterly when his relatives departed, but presently he dried his tears and set about making the best of his position. He unearthed the clam-shell and blew the embers into a fire. Next he made a hammer with which he built a rude shelter. A diet of clams at first satisfied him, but before long he made a hook in hopes of catching some trout. He went up the river to a suitable spot, dropped in his baited hook and almost immediately felt a bite. He hauled up his line eagerly, but it was only a worthless bull-head. Angrily he pulled out the hook and threw the fish back into the water. Almost immediately there was a bite, again he drew up his line only to find as before that it was a bull-head, which he hurled back into the river. This happened twice more, until, discouraged at landing only four useless fish, he wrapped his head

*756 pass to the cured person.

(3) In more difficult cases the shaman uses his basin and seeks assistance from others by a frenzied beating of sticks. He sends some young man out to fill the receptacle at the river, sets it near the patient, and throws water over him as he kneads in the manner already described. While this is going on, and 533 it is often a lengthy performance, another shaman, or someone 535 accustomed to lead the singers, ranges the bystanders into two 755 rows, facing each other between the door and the central fire. Each is provided with a beating stick such as the singers use, and a sounding-board is placed before each row. The clever dancer who has been commissioned to lead the orchestra of stick-beaters stands near the door and the musicians take their time from his movements. First he slowly raises both arms and all beat time softly, then, as he lifts his arms higher, the noise increases, and he sways from side to side as if carried away by the music; as he does so the men towards whom he leans intensify their beating, while those on the other side decrease. Back and forth he sways followed by the beating; nearing the climax he treads mincingly, whereat the noise rises to thunder-pitch, then jumps twice, and as he strikes the ground the drums beat and all the sticks come down with a final ear-splitting crash. Throughout the whole the women drone i.....This elaborate beating of time is repeated four times, on each occasion concluding with the double jump which calls forth the double thunder of drums and sticks.

755 Meanwhile the functioning shaman is gurgling and chat-
*756 tering through half-closed lips, and at intervals the leader, or any stick-beater, shouts hoip, a call which is supposed to soothe the supernatural beings. The din is tremendous. No explanation could be found of the meaning of this noise.

"It has always been done," say the Bella Coola, and they theorize no further.

At last the shaman rises from the sick person, holding his hands carefully cupped together as if he held something within

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

them that might escape. It is the sickness! The din increases; the leader works himself into a frenzy with his rapid gyrations, then he stills the noise as the shaman goes to the door. In dead silence, the more striking in contrast to the previous tumult, he partly opens his hands and puffs against them, as if blowing something out of the door, at the same time calling out, hoip. Again the beating of sticks breaks out, again it is stilled, and again the shaman blows forth the sickness. This is done four times. The shaman uses his own discretion whether to send the sickness through the door or the smoke-vent. 755 756 * [535]

A variant of this method is for the functioning shaman to dance during the beating of sticks, before throwing himself on the patient. With chattering teeth and shaking rattle, he revolves sunwise, his free arm bent at the elbow so that his wrist, which he shakes freely, is close to his chin; at intervals he calls out, snuaixwa. It is a serious and important proceeding to the Bella Coola, and the effects are considered nullified if a dog barks during the stick-beating. [535]

(4) Some powerful shamans cure by the use of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. A roll made of these two substances is placed among glowing embers until it is itself afire, when the shaman puts it in his mouth. After dancing for some time to the accompaniment of frenzied stick-beating, he hauls forth the bark, still burning, and again puts it in the fire. This is done four times. Then he thrusts the burning bark into the patient's mouth, and leaves it there for some time before pulling it forth. This, too, is repeated four times. When finally drawn forth, it has attracted the sickness, which can then be thrown away by the throwing away of the bark. It seems clear that this must be done by conjuring, but the writer was unable to learn the method employed, and was repeatedly assured that no subterfuge was used. [824] [535]

(5) One illness is caused by a person carelessly stepping on a dead salmon, such as dot the banks of the rivers in the autumn. The fish, indignant, injects a sickness into the offender. [753] [825] to make known to all that there will be a dance on the following day, using the name of the shaman. After such announcement, it would be most unusual for anyone to think of leaving a village until after the performance.

Towards dusk on the appointed day the people are summoned to the house of the shaman. Near the door are seated those who are not initiated kukusiut; in the inner part of the house are members of the society, with the singers in their accustomed places behind the fire. The shaman stands alone between the fire and the door and sings one of his songs, the time being marked by the words alone. Then he dances, his wrists shaking, his head rolling from side to side, and his feet marking time to the beating of sticks, as the singers accompany the singing of his song. If more than one song has been composed he dances to each, always accompanied by other shamans and by them alone. The shaman's costume consists of the usual blanket, and eagle down is scattered in his hair, with the additional and distinctive mark of intertwined dyed, and undyed, cedar-bark. After every song, the singers beat time very rapidly,[7] too rapidly for the dancer to keep pace with it, so he merely sways backwards and forwards shaking his hands violently. Then the shaman, assisted by a few friends whom he has chosen for the purpose, performs a conjuring feat to impress the uninitiated. The kukusiut realize that this may be merely a deception, but since real shamans perform something of the same nature, there is always the possibility that it may be genuine. The shaman may choose some feat which he has seen some old shaman perform, or he may use something which he has seen in a dream; or rely purely on his own inventive ability, aided, as he always is, by carpenters. The method of carrying out each trick is carefully guarded, with the result that it was impossible to obtain information about more than a few. After the conjuring act, the shaman gives food to all, followed by presents. If it is the first time that he has given

[7]This fast beating of time is called ähl; it occurs only in shaman and tsesk dances.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

such a ceremony, that is, if he is validating his name, the gifts must be valuable. On later occasions, irrespective of whether it is the same trick or another that is performed, the presents will be of small value. Goods so given are not returnable. After dancing, a shaman wears his collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark all summer, in fact until he rids himself of his supernatural endowment by the performance of a kusiut rite the following winter. 756* 556 [292]

Thus there is close inter-dependence of shaman and kusiut dances. On any later occasion, at a ceremony when songs of all types are being sung, if the singers beat out the tunes of those used at the ritual just described, the shaman dances to them. This is said to "cure" him, as if the power within him was a source of danger. [575] [533] [535]

The following are examples of the conjuring tricks performed, most of them done by the shaman Ninitsamlaix, a relative of an informant, who was able to learn the methods employed. 756* 789

On one occasion Ninitsamlaix prepared two boxes, apparently the ordinary wooden sort used for cooking; across each he arranged a diagonal cross-piece so that the receptacle contained two watertight compartments. Previous to the performance, Ninitsamlaix poured water, dyed red with the bark of the alder, into one section of one of the boxes, and put eagle down in one of the compartments of the other. When the time came to carry out the rite he asked an accomplice, another shaman, to bring some water and pour it into his box. This was done, the assistant taking care to put it into the empty half, not into that which contained the dyed water. Ninitsamlaix shook the box and poured out some of the liquid to prove that it really was water, and then drank. The spectators, unaware of the cross-piece, did not notice that he did so from the corner opposite to that from which he had poured the water. He had, of course, drunk the dyed fluid. Ninitsamlaix cried out that what he had swallowed was paining him, and proceeded to vomit the red water, much to the surprise of the shaman pours the grease on the central fire, and throws on it 755

also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it 782 is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the sickness to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and 756 *
dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. 556
Until he gives his first dance a newly created shaman is known as a lsux, the same word that is used for a kusiut initiate, and [575]
during this period he wears the shaman's collar of intertwined dyed and undyed cedar-bark. If he is wealthy and influential, a shaman will repeat his dance every fourth year. Such a per- [796]
formance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the kusiut ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things strangely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose [535] power is derived from the dead dances with head bent downwards, his free hand pointing to the ground with first finger extended. Also his cry of "xwai, xwai, xwai," uttered at intervals with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always terminates with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot trans- 756 *
mit their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they 533 choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that [428] all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers assist the visionaries in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the distant past, 539
is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which 756 *
shamanistic power is received from the dead.[8] 775

[8] A few stories of similar type have been included in vol. I, chap. VIII to explain the life of the dead, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

CHAPTER I

WINTER CEREMONIAL DANCES

000

General Observations on the Kusiut Society — Powers and Functions of the Society — Initiation — The Ritual of Specific Dances — Various Origin Myths — Kusiut Prerogatives Other than Dances — The Death of a Kusiut — The Final Rite — Concluding Observations and History.

General Observations on the Kusiut Society

IN view of the importance of the kusiut society in the lives of the Bella Coola, it would seem logical to have described it in an earlier part of this monograph. Though an integral part of the complicated structure of social organization, it is a secret, semi-religious grouping which can best be treated separately. The word kusiut is connected etymologically, according to native belief, with siut, the term for a supernatural being. Thus the meaning of the society's designation is "The Supernatural," or "The Learned," for siut has both these significations. A member of the society is likewise called a kusiut, plural, kukusiut.

575* 575* 192 [776]

The investigator soon learns of the existence of the society. If he asks a man his name, and then inquires further what type of designation it is, the answer is always that it is his kusiut name, that is, the one by which he is known as a member of the society. Ancestral names are used only at potlatches or other ceremonial occasions, whereas an individual's kusiut appellation is the one which he uses commonly. Moreover, for about three months of every year the Bella Coola live in an atmosphere of kusiut dances with a performance, or its preliminaries, taking place almost every night. Preparations for this ceremonial season, for so it may be termed, begin four days after the September moon is full, while the actual dances commence early in November and are continued until March. During this period the kukusiut are believed to be in intimate

535 contact with supernatural beings, so that it is a time for grave
*575 thoughts and decorous behaviour. Even by day the members
796 pass from house to house with dignified mien, not loitering
[787] around the sidewalks nor indulging in frivolity. Every effort is made to prevent quarrels between members who are expected to show by their appearance and actions the gravity of the rites in which they are engaged. Night after night they assemble at the house wherein the dance is taking place; those who have performed, and are therefore most closely in touch with the supernatural, even sleep there, not returning to their own houses until March. A dance usually lasts four nights, and during that time the performer's house, in which it takes place, is termed a nuqpik, "An Empty House." The significance of this designation is unknown.

178 Membership in the society depends on a duly validated
*575 ancestral prerogative to perform one of the many kusiut dances.
[424] At the present time every Bella Coola is a kusiut, even babes in arms being initiated, but formerly no one was admitted until he or she had reached an age of discretion. Some informants went so far as to say that the hair of an initiate must have begun to turn grey, and all agreed that no one was ever admitted until at least twenty, or more often, twenty-five years of age. Initiates were frequently still older; one woman, for example, stated that her mother was past the age of child-bearing before admission. Since only a member of the society [551] could be called by a kusiut name, the uninitiated continued to be known by the ancestral names conferred on them at infancy until they received kusiut designations. The importance of the 178 society depends on the belief of the uninitiated in the super-
*575 natural powers of its members, and as there are now none to 796 impress, the rites carried out today are little more than pic-
128 tures of what took place years ago. It is the aim of the Bella Coola to carry out the dances as if uninitiated persons were in attendance, and since most of the following information was obtained from men who well remembered their sensations when not members of the society, it is justifiable to use the present

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*575 787 776 796 Ālquntäm enters and confers on kusiut matters with Sexsexkālaix, his assistant in affairs connected with his functions as leader of the supernatural kukusiut.[1] This being acts as announcer and intermediary with Ālquntäm, but himself lacks the power of initiating matters. The two discuss whether or not it is advisable to allow mortal kukusiut to perform certain dances of the type known as kusiotem (II, p.128), and if so, they transmit the necessary power to the earthly dancer who has the proper prerogative, thus enabling him to give a graphic representation of what is done in the upper land.

*575 796 787 776 535 This is the essence of the kusiut dances. Each portrays a performance given by one of the supernatural beings in the house above, or some other aspect of his activities. Each earthly dancer has as patron a supernatural being, usually the one who carries out the dance of which his own is a model, and between patron and protégé there exists a relationship by means of which the latter receives the power necessary to perform. To do so, the uninitiated believe that he must receive a yeux, which can be translated as "call," from his associate above. Moreover, not only is each patron a supernatural being, but each is guided by Ālquntäm in the performance of the kusiut rites in the land above, which indirectly increases the prestige of the protégé.

*575 787 776 796 184 [1]The differences of belief of individual Bella Coola, dependent upon family traditions, is nowhere shown with greater clearness than in this meeting of the leaders of the supernatural dancers. It is clear that the Bella Coola have no uniformity of belief, even in what might be regarded as fundamental concepts. One informant, well versed in kusiut matters, asserted that there are five supernatural leaders, Ālquntäm and his assistants, Smaiaikila, Sexsexkālaix, Snunlkāls, and Sunxālotla. Others were equally emphatic that Ālquntäm is the kusiut name of the supreme deity, and that Sunxālotla, Smaiaikila, and Snunlkāls, are merely other designations for the same deity with regard to different functions. This belief has been followed during the monograph, by designating the supreme deity as Ālquntäm, the name by which he is termed with respect to his kusiut powers. These two opinions are not as basically different as appears at first sight. A man [828] is considered as having two, or more, personalities with respect to different rites at which he is called by different names. Since the supreme deity is regarded as a superman, who functions in diverse manners, it is not difficult to understand how these are sometimes ascribed to different individuals, and sometimes to the one under different names.

2:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

though the cost of validating such a prerogative is less than a potlatch, yet a Cannibal dance, for example, entails considerable expenditure, so a man entitled to give such a ceremony frequently lends his right to another, or it may lie dormant for generations. Like other loaned prerogatives, failure to return is a frequent cause of feud. A man frequently gives away a kusiut name-prerogative, and if he should give away all of them, he becomes legally an uninitiated. In such a case it is customary for his wife, or some relative, to give him a new kusiut prerogative, as is likewise the case when a master causes a slave to be initiated. A name is sometimes given to a person who resembles a deceased relative of the donor.

575* 424 425 553 [556] [578] [426]

(2) A Patron, omätuts. Little need be said on this point. The words of the songs used by the dancer often describe his patron, always couched in mystical terms for the benefit of the uninitiated. If the supernatural associate performs any type of dance at the gathering above, so can his protégé perform on this earth, otherwise his power is limited to singing of the being. If an individual inherits prerogatives with the same patron from two different relatives, he can merge these to give a composite dance, with consequent additional power. Greedy individuals sometimes illegally add features to which they are not entitled, a cause of bitter feelings. Or one individual may own several prerogatives with different patrons. Although most kukusiut have only one, yet two or three are not uncommon and one case is known of a man with six distinct patrons. The uninitiated believe that from any one of these may come the call giving him the power to perform.

575* 424 776 [533] [535] [578]

(3) A Repository. In this subterranean shelter his name remains, guarded by Änoºlikwolsaix. An individual with several prerogatives has a repository for each.

575* 424 778

Although the kukusiut are aware that much of their ritual is deception, it is clear that they believe in the supernatural origin of their rites, and that their ancestors actually had the abilities which their descendants of today imitate. In time

[773] [781]

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

The following morning the kukusiut alone are invited to X's house. The marshals meanwhile superintend the laying and lashing of planks across two river dug-outs to form a dancing platform. On this the singers take their places, in addition to as many kukusiut as can scramble aboard. The craft is slowly poled either up- or downstream, according to the direction of X's repository, and more kukusiut accompany it along the bank; the uninitiated watch with keen interest from the background. X and his companions proceed towards the river and on meeting the lashed-together canoes are taken aboard. The singers strike up any well known kusiut tune, and in time to it as many kukusiut as possible dance on the platform surmounting the craft. Each uses his own style of dancing according to his prerogative, so that the scene is strikingly varied and animated. X himself cowers in the centre, practically concealed from the uninitiated by the dancers. On reaching the village the whole party hurriedly runs to X's house, from which the uninitiated are rigorously barred for the rest of the day. Those kukusiut who accompanied the party along the bank of the river have preceded them and, as X enters, the droning cry is raised which always heralds the appearance of one who has been in close contact with supernatural beings. 575* 796 [535] [535] [424] [201]

If X is considered trustworthy, he may be allowed to go alone to his repository, although this is only customary when he takes a second or third prerogative. If this procedure has been followed, X tells those present what he has seen; otherwise his companions do so. The uninitiated listen eagerly from the adjacent houses, wondering anxiously what is taking place. Several kukusiut blow, or use bellow-whistles to increase the awe of the hearers. Presently a herald is sent out. He goes first to the lowest house[10] of the village, then in succession to those above, announcing in each that: 575* 203

"Something strange has happened to the son of the chief." 796

X's name is not mentioned; if his father is not a chief the [10] That is, to the one farthest downstream. By always going to each house in order from bottom to top of the village the herald avoids any danger of omissions.

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

prohibitions that last not for one year, but for four. X is not subject to any other restraints. If he wishes to go hunting he can remove his cedar-bark collar and hang it for convenience in the forest near his village, redonning it on his return. The kukusiut show considerable interest in their new member not only by warning him what he must not do, but by teaching him how to dance and to growl or make other of the necessary, but unusual, noises. During the remainder of the ceremonial season X is required to attend every kusiut dance, thereby learning much of the ceremonial, and during the following summer his relatives, especially if food is plentiful, frequently invite the kukusiut to their house. The singers beat out well-known tunes, or practise those which will be required for the following winter; if a song has been composed for X he dances in time to it, in the style proper to his prerogative. Formerly, when there were many novices, dances of this type took place frequently and were useful in giving constant practice to singers and neophytes alike. As no calls from supernatural patrons can come at this time of year, it follows that all such dances are of a non-sacred nature, although the uninitiated are excluded. During his period as a novitiate, X has one privilege; he can take food from anyone at any type of ceremony. It is remembered that one novice was even bold enough to take food which had been placed as an offering for the dead.

When the next kusiut season opens, X attends every performance. This is probably the most thrilling and nerve-racking period in his life. He does not know exactly when he will be allowed to give his dance, since that is a matter of arrangement between his relatives and the marshals, but he knows that the time will soon be at hand. When the great day, or rather night, actually comes, X is usually in a state of abject terror. The rite itself does not differ from those about to be described except that the first song relates the manner in which X found the repository. But the mental attitude of X differs greatly from that of an old performer. One informant, if he so desires. The kukuisi listen to the song, and when it is running they join in. They practise it repeatedly, until familiar with both words and tune. This part of the ceremony lasts for about two hours.

The singers, and any others who are prepared to beat time, are always provided with long, flat, thin sounding-boards to increase the din of the pounding. When the moderators decide that the song is sufficiently familiar, they call some of the kukuisi to carry these boards to the lowest house of the village. They do this, and also scatter clean sand on the floor, as is customary whenever a supernatural being is to come. The uninitiated persons within the house watch with great interest. The singers enter and take their places behind the fire, then other kukuisi and finally X himself; his face is unblackened, but he wears his two eagle tails in his hair and a collar of dyed cedar-bark. On his head is a thin cylindrical circlet, about four inches high, of the same material, ornamented with swan's down by the inhabitants of the villages of the upper Bella Coola valley. The collar consists of a roll of grass, entirely covered with dyed cedar-bark from which pendant tassels of the same hang down over his chest; similar ones are worn by nanai dancers, except that the tassels hang down their backs. Every kukuisi dancer wears these two ornaments, and those who have the necessary prerogative adorn themselves with an apron of deer hoofs or puffin beaks. Blankets are always worn. Kukuisi women wear in addition woollen pubic garments.

As the singers beat out X's tune, accompanied by the voices of themselves and other kukuisi, he dances. Since his style is typical of all kukuisi except Cannibals and a few others, it will be well to digress at this point in order to describe it. X raises his arms until their upper parts are approximately the height of his shoulders, and project outwards and slightly to the front; they are bent at the elbows with the forearms vertical, thus bringing the hands opposite the top of the head. Both wrists are shaken vigorously, the muscles of the lower

[The Dance of Nuxalxnim]

575 arms being brought into play, so that the whole hands are con-946 stantly quivering without spasmodic movements. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a skillful performer, and the incon-535 stant shaking is continued without stop throughout the dance.
[539] Most Sacrier songs are in five parts, which may be described as three verses, separated by two choruses. Near the beginning of the first verse X stands up, raises his arms, shakes his fingers, then slightly bends his legs and begins to step in time to the beating of the sticks. Some dancers remain almost stationary, marking time, to use the military term, others advance in steps of an inch or so, at intervals slowly revolving sunwise.[*] Sometimes X introduces a variation by bending from side to side, in which case one hand rises above the other. If the time of the song is very slow, he sinks, bending his knees to a great extent, and advances in more lengthy strides, never ceasing to shake his hands. At each chorus the time becomes so rapid that it is impossible to move the feet in accordance with it, and then X crouches, his shaking hands the only movement. If it [#24] is a woman who is dancing—like most Sacrier prerogatives, this [#24] one is not limited to men—the style of dancing is quite different. Keeping the upper part of each arm close to her body, the dancer extends her fore-arms, outwards, parallel to the ground, with the palms upwards. Like a man, she shakes her wrists, but few female dancers move from the spot on which they start, except perhaps to turn around, sunwise. Females always keep up a running fire of comments, especially when a woman is dancing, urging her not to be bashful, but to allow her hands to shake. Some dancers have merged into one [#24] prerogative rights acquired from different control tribes. In such cases they perform in two or more styles, each part according to one prerogative.

Sacrier are always ready to assist one of their fellows, so that three or four friends are always willing to accompany the dancer. They stand close behind him, at frequent intervals blowing over his head the eagle down which either X, or some of his relatives, has given them for this purpose. When he 575*

crouches during the chorus they crowd close around, almost 796*
concealing him. Particularly in those dances fraught with 535 danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely stands up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. [543]
It is considered contrary to good manners for a father to help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is pleased to [171] have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bella Bella certain kukwiat have definite prerogatives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bella Coola. Throughout [533] every dance the kukwiat women utter their drooing cry.

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in 575*
the lowest house see. They hear the song, too, and gaze with 796*
awe at X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight.
Then the mounting-boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.[10] All the kukwiat now return to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A bow- [534] drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and when the song has been finished two men continue in turn to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend experienced the distribution of food, which follows his final [574] dancing. As the kukwiat are eating, the marshals deliver their usual admonishments, a task that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back-wall of the house. Materials have been placed in readiness so that it is an easy matter to build a framework a few feet in height, of which the flat top is screened by a matting wall about three feet high. This is often decorated with designs of dyed cedar-bark without ritual significance so [531] far as the Bella Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the kukwiat disperse, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place.

Among the passengers in Noółqnem's canoe are a number of singers, who replace the usual ones on this nałaxam. Each wears the same type of mask, painted with red diagonals, and with white feathers* projecting from the top.* After the uninitiated have gazed for some time upon the wonders, their leader, Swałowwimatił, takes his place and his followers begin to beat out an ancient song, believed to be sung in Noółqnem's craft as it nears Bella Coola. The theme is:

"See me, mortals, I am Nawawaistkdimat Noółqnem, the dancer of Noółqnem."

As the music starts, a figure rises from among the singers, wearing a mask with heavy eye-brows* and carrying a light staff about six feet in length, wound spirally with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with a tassel of dyed bark. Holding this in his hand he begins to dance lightly, running back and forth a few steps at a time in time to the beating of sticks, lifting his feet freely from the ground, and bending back and forth in airy grace, all the while waving his wand to and fro. There are no fixed steps, the only essential is that he convey the impression of being light of foot and a good dancer; accordingly, the person selected for this purpose is one with these qualifications. As he moves, Awałkwałaix explains to the uninitiated that this is Nawawaistkdimat, a dancer of great repute who accompanies Noółqnem and guards his singers. At this point Awałkwałaix's own song may or may not be sung. It never varies, and is believed to have been handed down from dim antiquity. X himself must be the singer, accordingly it can be sung only when the dancer has a good voice. If this is the case, the marshals request him to perform, and, if necessary, teach him the exact words. X, standing behind the fire, sings alone and unaccompanied, then the singers repeat the song in unison with the beating of their sticks, and Awałkwałaix herself dances, using, of course, the feminine style. At this juncture the uninitiated must be ex-

"Path Clearers" see to it that no one passes between him and the fire. The uninitiated are not expelled from the house and their curiosity is aroused. Meanwhile the singers prepare songs for X, describing his supernatural patrons, and some kukusiut carpenters are instructed to make in secret ten small pieces of wood, about one foot in length and six inches wide, sometimes half-moon shaped. They cover these with dyed cedar-bark on which they paint the designs appropriate to each being.[33] On the morning of the fourth day,[34] X blackens his face with soot or charcoal, obtained by pouring water on a fire, and dons the usual kusiut costume. A herald then invites the kukusiut to assemble in X's house. Presently they proceed to the lowest house of the village, where the singers beat out the tunes of the "Path Clearers," remembered from a previous year. They dance, while X stands, shifting his feet and moving his apron as if he also wished to perform but was too weary to do so. This is repeated at every house of the village, except that in which the potlatch was held; most of the kukusiut follow the procession, as do some of the uninitiated. Finally, with X last of all, they enter the potlatch house, where foreign guests and many uninitiated have assembled.

In Kimsquit the preliminary four days of watching are omitted, but from this point on, the rites of the two areas are practically identical.[35] As X enters, all the kukusiut who have pounding sticks begin to beat on the floor and the women drone. Without delay, and without attention to the timeless thumping, X begins to dance, sunwise, around the fire, at intervals casting on it particles of eagle down which have the effect of making the supernatural ones above take their places. He calls out intermittently that he can see the beings above sitting down, and a herald repeats his remarks loudly. In Bella Coola the four "Path Clearers" walk close behind X.

[33] The distinctive designs are given by Boas, to whom the reader is referred.

[34] It is possible that X must first lie down when Nestpam's dancer reports that the moon is at the mouth of the river.

[35] It is uncertain whether the differences in ritual are typical of Bella Coola and Kimsquit, or merely represent variations in individual prerogatives.

to allow his son to be initiated on the next day. Then X dances once more and the kukusiut disperse. 575* 796*

There is no need to repeat an account of the preliminaries of nabusam, including the construction of the two shelters in the back corners of the house and the summoning first of the kukusiut and then of the uninitiated. When all is ready, a masked figure representing Xemxemälotla appears from one of the shelters, and dances around the fire, sunwise, revolving sunwise at the same time, while the kukusiut men pound violently, the kukusiut women drone, and the uninitiated stare with open mouths. As he dances he sings: [535]

"I am Xemxemälotla. The supernatural beings call continually on me as they give me presents. See me."

Then he stands in the centre of the space behind the fire, holding in his hand a stick that has just been given to him and which is decorated with dyed and undyed cedar-bark and a tuft of swan down at the top and middle. The beating of sticks died down while Xemxemälotla was making his announcement, but it now breaks out afresh as Xemcua appears. He too dances around the fire, announces his name and stands on Xemxemälotla's right. There is more pounding, and out comes Ano'likwolsaix, who circles the fire and stands on Xemxemälotla's left. But instead of remaining motionless she constantly moves about the house, now here, now there, talking to the uninitiated and assuring them that it is Xemxemälotla whom they see. She takes care not to come into close contact with the uninitiated as her identity might be detected. One after the other the other patrons emerge, dance around the fire, and take their stations alternately to right and left of Xemxemälotla. Kulilias Nuskämpta keeps leaving his place as if to seek things from different parts of the house, while Älmäk', who is a kingfisher, moves to and fro in quick, hopping steps, imitating the actions of that bird. A few minutes after Thiscäplilän·a has joined the others, Xemxemälotla begins to hum loudly: [535]

[The Cannibal Dance]

*575 in banning the rite if they do not think the dancer will be able
*796 to carry it out properly. When the call comes, the uninitiated [424] are at once expelled from the Cannibal's house; later he rushes to the graveyard and exhumes one of the meat-filled frames previously buried. Non-members watch with horror as he sinks his teeth in the "flesh." Closely guarded, he is then taken to every house where, if they are bold, the uninitiated peer forth from their bedrooms and watch his performance. He carries part of the corpse in his arms and periodically sinks his teeth in the repulsive mass. As usual, apparent attempts are made to tie him to this earth, but in spite of them he escapes to the upper regions where he remains for an unusually long [824] period. Great efforts are made to reduce him to a state of emaciation, for which purpose he drinks large amounts of water in which cedar-wood has been boiled. When the Cannibal ultimately returns to earth, the cannibalistic incubus is expelled and he at length becomes normal. When dancing, a [535] corpse-eater constantly bends both hands towards the floor in front of him and upwards, as though raising some heavy object towards his face. Then his head sinks towards this, only to be thrown quickly upwards and to one side, with a wild expression in his eyes. The uninitiated are told that this represents the manner in which he lifts a corpse towards his mouth and bites, only to be revolted by its putrescence. He has, they hear, no actual liking for human flesh, but his incubus fills him with an irresistible craving for it. Frequently [532] he wears on his blanket wooden representations of skulls (see Plate 7), symbolic of the corpses devoured.

*575 Rarely, a corpse-eating Cannibal kills a slave and pretends
796 to devour his body as a means of impressing the uninitiated,[] but usually this is done only under the driving force of revenge 567 or jealousy. If a man hears that a near relative, slave of a 648 foreign tribe, has been killed, he often determines to wipe out blood with blood. He consults a corpse-eating Cannibal, and

[The Scratch Dance]

*575 and the heralds keep telling all to be attentive. The chorus
*796 for every Scratcher's song consists of the supposedly meaning-[533] less words, 'aii, 'aii, as if a child were crying. It is said that the [171] same refrain is used for Scratch dances by every coastal tribe. After this practice the singers chant forth X's song more loudly, the audience joins in, and he dances. The Scratch
*575 dance differs from all other kusiut ones in that there are no
*796 fixed movements, with the exception of keeping time to the 535 beating of sticks with the feet. The dancer sometimes bends down and forward, with arms closely pressed between his legs, or he bends back with arms thrown upwards; to and fro and back and forth he goes with high steps or short mincing ones, with hops or jumps, his arms waving like the arms of a windmill. The best Scratch dancer is the one who can put most action and originality into his movements. The weird effect is increased by moving the facial muscles to cause strange grimaces. Four kukusiut, two before and two behind, accompany
*575 X. At intervals he becomes excited and seizes his own hair
*796 as if in internal agony, whereupon his guardians press the back of his neck and call hoip to soothe him. His dance completed, he sits down, and no other performers follow him. The [431] presents provided by X and his relatives are then distributed, those scratched and the song makers being the chief recipients, although everyone receives something. Then there is the usual meal, accompanied by admonitions from the marshals, followed by X dancing once more to his song.

Unlike most kusiut ceremonials, this does not complete the night's rites. Accompanied by a number of kukusiut, X visits every house in the village, and dances around the fire with wildly waving arms while the whistle sounds eerily. Since the [535] musicians do not beat time, his dance is without rhythmic qualities, otherwise it follows the lack of pattern just described. When he is brought back to his own house, the frenzied beating of sticks is twice repeated to soothe him, and water is thrown over him. Thus pacified, X goes to sleep and the kukusiut quietly disperse.

* 575 The singers have also composed a song for each of the ănuyux
* 796 and these too must be practised, while the men dance or remain 533 still as they think fit. Since no uninitiated are present the affair is purely a rehearsal. The words of each of these songs is of the manner in which the patron helped X to survive his ordeal. By this time it is late and the kukusiut disperse after the usual meal and admonitions of the marshals.

* 575 The next day, qothm, the carpenters assemble early in the
* 796 morning to start work. Since X is entitled to portray any of 532 the supernatural beings who are companions of his patron in the land above, it follows that there is wide variation in his choice of masks to be manufactured. The principal supernatural beings are always shown, and any animals, since all are supernatural, can likewise be displayed. As usual, a few kukusiut are invited at midday to share the meal provided for the carpenters. The number of masks to be provided is often so great that two days or more are necessary for their completion, in which case no ceremony takes place on the night [533] which would normally be qothm; the kukusiut merely gather and again practise their songs.

* 575 But the day after is qothm. At dusk the kukusiut are called
* 796 in for a final rehearsal of the songs, and then a summons is sent [515] to the uninitiated, who have been washing and beautifying [532] themselves in eager anticipation. In Kimsquit it is customary [184] to hang some of the masks on a sloping pole behind the fire and the sight of these amazes the non-members. First the singers
[781] beat out the song of one of the women mourners and she dances in time to it, while the heralds near the door keep up a steady
[535] stream of remarks, encouraging the woman to perform yet
[834] more strenuously and to have no modesty about shaking her breasts. Then another of the women dances, followed in succession by the third and fourth if that is the number who sang the mourning songs. Next the ănuyux perform, each in succession accompanying the song composed for him. Now comes the central feature of the evening, the performance of X himself. As the singers strike up the shaman's song which he is 776 Anumintsknum. Three or four masked figures appear together to portray these beings. Their function is to remind Alquntäm of those whom he should invite to his ceremonials above.

Snuuq. As this dreaded monster appears, the uninitiated cower convulsively and the kukusiut women drone. Several [789] masked figures accompany the Snuuq around the fire, blowing eagle down over the creature, and Ano°likwolsaix explains to the uninitiated that this is to protect them from the monster. The heralds as usual echo her remarks. After one circuit of the fire, the Snuuq disappears into one of the enclosures behind the fire.

Haohao. This supernatural, mythological denizen of the mountains, is in the form of an enormous bird with long beak and bony wings. The mask worn with the disguise is usually [592] about three feet in length, in the shape of a bird's head with long beak. A stick passes from its butt down the wearer's back and is held in place by his belt, thus balancing the heavy, projecting bill (see Plate 8).[1] It is hinged so that the performer can make the mandibles snap together by pulling a cord concealed under his blanket. A good actor, and such is [535] always chosen to represent his creature, bends forward and downwards so that the snapping beak almost brushes the floor; then he rises and pauses like a bird when listening and half startled. Next he runs a few steps, in a mincing manner, thus slowly circling the fire, and ultimately passes from sight into the enclosure other than that from which he has emerged. Several kukusiut accompany the actor, blowing eagle down over him, the women drone and Ano°likwolsaix keeps up a string of comments. After a short pause a second haohao appears and circles the fire with its attendant kukusiut. The same procedure is repeated for a third and fourth.

Alxwolätnum. This is the supernatural herald for Thun- [532] der, the leading kusiut among supernatural beings. He wears

a mask representing a man and carries a stick with which he beats on the floor as he cries out: 575* 796*

"Come, ye supernatural ones. The most famous kusiut of all [Thunder] is about to dance." 776

Thunder. The mask representing this creature is large and of fearsome appearance with hooked beak and overhanging forehead; it is always carried by a man of powerful physique (see Plate 9).[1] A box has been placed beside the enclosure so that, when Thunder first appears, standing upon it, his apparent size is increased. He bends to and fro, and up and down, in an amazing fashion, blowing through his clenched teeth, while Ăno°likwolsaix informs the uninitiated who he is, and expatiates on his powers. After twisting and turning for several minutes, Thunder leaps to the floor of the house, and as he does so there sounds a peal of thunder. The uninitiated do not know that this is caused by a number of kukusiut rolling stones to and fro in large wooden boxes within the enclosures at the back. Then he starts to dance sunwise around the fire, bending down and up, shaking himself and stamping violently, his amazing gyrations being constantly accompanied by the reverberation of rolling stones. Escorted by several kukusiut he circles the fire, and after a final stamping and twisting, disappears into the enclosure. In a few minutes he appears again, and repeats his dance. Since no one man is strong enough to carry out this athletic performance twice in succession, the mask has been transferred to another kusiut within the enclosure, but of course the uninitiated are unaware of this. Thunder always comes out four times in all, on each occasion dancing once around the fire. Sometimes four different men perform; sometimes the one who danced first has recovered sufficiently to be able to repeat on the fourth round. The usual explanations by Ăno°likwolsaix add zest to the rite. On this occasion the customary dance of Thunder with a fire rattle was omitted.

*575 leave their bedrooms, but peer curiously and fearfully around
*796 the edge of the boards. Finally the party returns to X's house, whence the uninitiated hear the sound of sticks being beaten in a frenzied manner, but without the usual rhythmic conclusion. Each kusiut beats as he likes, because it is an affair [775] of the dead with whom all things are queer and unnatural.

*575 The ghosts wash and take their places in X's house where *796 the singers are working on a new song. The words, as if spoken
775 by the dancer, describe the land of the dead; how everything
533 is green there; how the river flows from west to east so that the sun travels upstream; how the shades wished to make him a chief, and deceived him by not giving proper presents; how he visited the various towns scattered along the river, finding the bone in one of the houses; and finally how the dead told him of any mistakes in ritual that had been committed in the Bella Coola villages, in Kimsquit, or in Tāl·io. This last is, of course, common knowledge, but the Ghost dance is the only kusiut ceremonial in which such information is used in the text of a song. Details are given, but the wording is so ambiguous that when the uninitiated later hear the song they do not comprehend its meaning. Since the kukusiut have concealed the error referred to, the necessity for veiled allusions is apparent. Everything connected with the Ghost dance is carried out in the reverse order; thus, the reference of X to presents which he did not receive is merely an intimation that he will presently bestow gifts on the singers and the other kukusiut who have assisted him. The wordless chorus of the tune consists of [171] 'aiya'axwaia, a phrase said to be the same for Ghost dances among all the coastal tribes. The singers practise this song while the audience listens attentively; then it is sung vigour-
*575 ously by all, while X dances. His style differs from that of all *796 other kukusiut; first one arm and then the other is kept ex-
●535 tended, downwards, at an angle in front of the body with the 424 forefinger pointing to the ground. This method of dancing is the prerogative of all Ghost dancers and provides a variation to the somewhat monotonous performances on different preferably skilled carpenters. Heralds visit every house in the village informing all that X has gone to meet, or to wait for, Dark-Shade. 575* 796*

Meanwhile X and his companions are utilizing the last hours of daylight in collecting a large quantity of gum. They build a fire, and by its flickering light the dancer is coated with gum so carefully that even his teeth and nails are invisible; in this disguise he represents Dark-Shade. Early the following morning the singers and those kukusiut who have already danced during the current season set off on lashed canoes to meet X and his party whom they take on board. Waiting till the tide is favourable, the canoes are slowly poled up the river. As they come in sight of the village, the singers strike up some well-known tune, and in time to it everyone on the platform between the canoes begins to dance, each using the style proper to his prerogative. It is an animated scene. The uninitiated watch the approach, and gaze with wonder upon the strange dark figure; it is all so uncanny that they need little urging from the kukusiut to withdraw to their houses, where they peer curiously through chinks in the walls. Members of the society line the river bank and, as Dark-Shade draws near, one after another cries out that a call has come to him. The marshals have previously decided who shall dance at this time and informed those selected; sometimes it is a kusiut who has already performed once during the season, or it may be a person who has not performed for many years. [535] [424] 575* 796* 787

All the kukusiut accompany Dark-Shade and her escort to X's house from which all uninitiated have long been expelled. The singers compose a new song of which the words are arranged as if Dark-Shade, not X, were speaking. The theme of one, used a number of years ago, is: 575* 796* [533]

"Let X fetch me to visit mortals."

Unfortunately, the details of X's dance were unavailable. Dark-Shade herself remains for four days hidden within X's house, though he attends the ceremonies of other kukusiut and his presence there on the nights of qotlim and nebusam is a

* 533 instrument is the drum.[1] In former times the drum consisted
* 796 solely of a box, though recently skin drums have been adopted
* 575 from the Carriers. There is usually one singer especially pro-[534] ficient in using this, though sometimes another takes his place;
[177] all such arrangements are completed during the final rehearsal. A final decision is also reached as to who shall fill the three principal parts, sankwolsäm, ältaia, and lsulkim. It is the duty of the sankwolsäm or leader, to regulate the time; he squats facing the others, who are grouped in a close semicircle, and indicates the rhythm by pounding with his stick on the floor. When a song is to start, he first taps rapidly, then modifies and regulates it throughout. The leader should be the best musician among the singers, and the same individual usually functions on all occasions although a rearrangement is sometimes necessary. In the centre of the singers sits the ältaia, announcer, who must possess a powerful voice. As already mentioned, every song consists of three parts, each with several subdivisions. When the leader has beaten time rapidly to indicate that the singers are ready, the announcer bellows out the words of the first subdivision so that all the audience can hear them. Crash! goes the leader's stick and his voice gives the key for singing the words just called out, in which the audience is expected to join. As they are finishing, the announcer roars the next subdivision, and the same procedure is repeated. Instead of proceeding to the third, the announcer often next returns to the first, following it by the second. The subdivisions of a single part are never sung through in order once only, there are always repetitions and ramifications according to the discretion of the announcer. At the end of the first part, the leader again beats time rapidly in which his fellow-singers join.
[535] If a dancer is performing, he crouches down without making any effort to keep time with the rapid tapping, and the singing ceases. After a short pause, the second part is sung in the same manner, followed likewise by the third. The function of

Nusāxkāmx Songs

The texts of nusāxkāmx songs are fragmentary and unsatisfactory. The rites in which they were used have long been discontinued and, since they were never ceremonially important, there was nothing to impress either tunes or words on the minds of the singers. In addition, it is probable that the songs were always less carefully constructed than those of other types. 533* [796]

Song Used for Qalen(a), a Kimsquit Man(b)

Qīnnaewistsīya	sīlmsīnnālcīnsīya	sīwīnmlandai
Be happy,	ye people,	it is about to come,

dīqīnlīyumdai	dīqalnlanīsīya
that hidden one(c),	Beaver.

[WORDLESS CHORUS]

Qalenī'i	Qalenī'i	wa·xai·yai
Beaver(d)!	Beaver!	wa·xai·yai(e).

(a) This word means "Beaver." It is most unlikely that it was the dancer's own designation, more probably a nickname used in connection with the nusāxkāmx rite. [551]

(b) Recorded as song VII D 9b, National Museum of Canada; singer, Louie Hall.

(c) This signifies a person who is hidden ceremonially, such as a hamat dancer who has gone to the land above. The dancer expected to be a Cannibal and the rite in which this song was used served as a kind of rehearsal. [796] [575]

(d) This refrain replaces a second and third part of the song itself.

(e) A meaningless series of choral ejaculations.

Song Used for a Kimsquit Woman(a)

Ānnapīlmqudaks	ānpīnnaudas	nqwīnmaxkīdas	ālnwīnkīdas
They heard	of Fawn(b),	when they were playing	long ago(c).

(a) Recorded as song VII D 9d, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.

(b) The theme being of a fawn, the dancer wore a deer-skin. [535]

(c) As in many nusāxkāmx songs, the words refer to an ancient story, probably one describing the adventures of deer and wolves; see vol. II, p. 438.

Song Used for Wannipkein, a Kimsquit Man(a)

Lālīwmnīnīmx	wannnqwīw·ai	wnīqīnki	qnīlmqīs
Run in all directions,	ye dogs,	for the first time	it is there

nwnqnīlwm	ānnīkīyīwm	mnnīs	mnnīs
he brings much food(b),	go below the house	?(c)	?(d).

[776] [192]

B Aiakāsiṣtsmālolsundja I was not good enough(d)	ālidāk·ānutldai when came to me	dikilomomāstutsldai my patron;	533*

umḟmstqwosamallnndai
I told him so.

[WORDLESS CHORUS]

C Wasqotlnuilots·ltiamālnkt No one passed outside his house(e)	āmāsdṣ·amālimdai within sight	diqotlqotlimḟodai when blackened his face

enlutlaikilasudai
Moon(f).

(a) This song, composed by Reuben Schooner, was used during the kusiut season of 1923-4.

(b) It was impossible to obtain individual translations for these three subdivisions.

(c) The reference is to the call. The meaning of this whole first part is highly problematical; the references are intentionally obscure to impress the uninitiated.

(d) That is: I did not have sufficient goods to distribute for a ceremony.

(e) The theme here changes from a description of the dancer's experience to an account of his patron's actions in the land above.

(f) That is: When Moon, the dancer's patron, blackened his face, no one passed even within sight of his house. As uninitiated are forbidden to pass in front of a dwelling in which a kusiut dance is taking place, so supernatural beings avoid the vicinity of Moon's house when he is performing. The blackening of the face refers to an eclipse, but has an added significance since it is an intimation of a dance. [776] [784] [821]

As already described (II, p. 229), the Otter dance differs from most kusiut rites and the songs are likewise peculiar. They do not vary from year to year and the following example, used during the season of 1923-4, contains many points of an unusual nature, not even understood by the participants themselves. It has only two parts, each with a different tune, and the performer carried out her rite by dancing in two distinct ways. In the first part, she raised and lowered her fore-arms as is customary, but followed this with a smoothing motion, as if she were levelling upturned earth. The significance of this seems to have been forgotten entirely. 533* [575]* [796]* [535] killed, his reputation would only be increased by the manner of his death. At length Ne-xwnkai fired into the air; not until a shower of eagle down was blown forth did anyone realize that his musket had been loaded with nothing more deadly. This marked the establishment of friendly relations.

B T [595] [431]

The Kitkatla had brought their own singers, who now began to beat out time for Tcuhua to perform a xwaak dance. He was followed by several other chiefs, and then the strangers gave presents to influential Bella Coola on the most lavish scale. Putlas likewise performed a xwaak dance, and bestowed gifts on the guests to validate it; such were, of course, not returnable. A meal was then served, and after that Tcuhua made a speech of which the gist was that the Bella Coola had previously known his achievements as a warrior, they now knew his nobility and bravery in risking his life, and that the name Tcuhua could never be forgotten, irrespective of his own fate.

Tcuhua left soon afterwards. It was somewhat difficult fully to comprehend his motive in thus risking his life. Undoubtedly his main object was to display his valour and disregard of danger. Moreover, it gave him an opportunity to impress these qualities upon the Bella Coola, and thus to exhibit his prowess actually within the enemy's camp, which must have been a source of tremendous gratification to him. The alleged motive, regret at killing a chief, may have been a contributory factor.

B T 648 556 574 [721]

Although this visit was an intimation from Tcuhua that the Bella Coola need have no further fear of him, the suspicions of years could not be immediately allayed; in fact, an occasional skirmish still took place although Tcuhua himself refrained from fighting. A few years after his visit to Bella Coola, Putlas prepared to give a potlatch to which he determined to invite the northern chief. Many of the Bella Coola doubted whether the Kitkatla warriors would respect the safe-conduct usually afforded to envoys, and no one was anxious to bear the invitation. At length six chiefs volunteered for the task and set out, though with many misgivings. They stopped en route at Bella Bella where a chief of that tribe, Omgu, joined the party; he thought that he would have influence with the Kitkatla and might add protection to the Bella Coola. Fearing to be seen by any small Kitkatla bands, the delegation travelled only by night until they could actually reach Tcuhua's village. As they paddled up, they indicated their mission by singing one of Putlas's xwaak songs. On hearing this, Tcuhua asked one of his Bella Coola slaves whose song it might be, and when he answered that it was one of Putlas's, Tcuhua despatched a chief, Kwinas, to invite the guests to his house. Omgu was thankful when he saw this man approaching, since he felt that it heralded a friendly welcome. The party was conducted to Tcuhua's

115 Schooner lacked the mental acumen of Joshua and Jim, but 177 he revealed himself as a tribal patriarch, proud of his family's [153] history and eager to assist his grandchildren and great-grand-children, but feeling himself lost and helpless in the struggle before them. With sadness, but without bitterness, he used to speak of the approaching end of Bella Coola culture, and his words brought home the tragedy which the spread of civilization brings to so many, and the responsibility resting upon the white people as a whole.

153 Until an intelligence test is devised to correlate the mental 115 ability of the white man with that of the native, it is impossible to compare the two scientifically. None the less, the writer deliberately expresses the opinion that Joshua Moody and Jim Pollard are two of the most brilliant men he has met in any walk of life. They are undoubtedly the most able of the Bella Coola; others have only slightly less ability, while the mass of the population compares favourably with an average white community. Their ability, however, is defi-
178 nitely conditioned by their conservatism. Absolute trust in the traditions of their ancestors has checked speculation, as the established explanation is never questioned; new inventions, unauthorized by custom, have been regarded as almost sacri-
[626] legious; the force of public opinion, while valuable as a deterrent to anti-social practices, has effectively restrained innovations. The Bella Coola are a good example of a community where development has been atrophied by extreme conservatism fostered by religious beliefs.

105 Taking into account the material obstacles, the achiev-[322] ements of these people have not been insignificant. In former times, provided only with tools of stone and untempered copper, they built graceful canoes, made watertight boxes, hewed planks from mighty cedars, and erected large houses which called for considerable engineering skill. Judged by [532] white standards, their carving and painting lacked artistic deli-
[535] cacy, but it required no mean ability to portray crest designs to meet their own standards. Passing from the purely mechanical

to the aesthetic, their skill in dancing and dramatics is noteworthy: no one who has witnessed a native dance can fail to have been impressed by the performance of the participants and the stage-craft of the carpenters. The fact that no system of writing had ever been devised has prevented the establishment of a native literature, but the practice of passing down an extensive folklore by word of mouth shows their narrative powers as well as their faculty for remembering details. At present it is difficult to appreciate what must have been their energy in earlier times when they faced the struggle for existence, armed with stone tools. Abundant salmon gave them adequate food, but only when weirs had been built with great labour. Though game was plentiful, the hunter was equipped with nothing more formidable than a bow and arrow. The simplest task required patience and skill undreamed of by the average white man. If the reader will allow his imagination to carry him backwards two hundred years, he will realize that the mere provision of food and clothing necessitated constant effort and ceaseless exertion.

Hand in hand with many admirable characteristics, the Bella Coola display others which strike the white man as unprepossessing. A first impression is the untidiness of their houses. Exteriorly, they are often fairly neat, but confusion reigns within. Clothing, instead of being hung up, is left lying on the floor; bed-coverings are piled carelessly; dirty dishes cover the tables; dogs and children swarm over the floor; flies abound; all is dirty and slovenly. The house itself may be uncompleted; a window lacks glass and has been boarded up; the roof leaks, or the steps are falling down. Nor are the surroundings more attractive. There is one struggling flower-bed in the village, but elsewhere the houses are surrounded by wastes of mud where horses and cattle wander, dogs prowl, and children play. In the distance the mountain peaks rise in splendour, but near at hand all is squalid and unkempt.

They are only slightly more particular about their personal appearance. Dirt does not distress them. They wash occa-

501 of the older people remember seeing in their youth another type, lakan, with a high raised prow; this may have been identical with the mdka which others describe as having an elevated bow and a low stern. An entirely different craft was the tamkwl-i, named from one of the geese, [525] probably the white-fronted goose. A strip of maple fastened along each side caught the water in moving, with a sound like that of the peculiar rustling flight of the bird. The bow was often carved in the form of a [532] bird's head and the stern in that of a tail to further the resemblance. No living Bella Coola claims to have seen one of these canoes, though some had heard of them from their grandparents. The large, open type of canoe made by the Haida was known to the Bella Coola, but not constructed by them. Sails were used on all ocean-going canoes; they were usually of matting, though skins sewn together were occasionally employed.

501 Canoes are occasionally lashed together. In several kusint dances a wide platform for dancing is required, and the need is met by lashing 535 planks crosswise over two canoes, near the bow and stern, thus fastening them together. Planking is laid on the two supports and a platform so constructed. Careful inquiries showed that this fastening was merely a temporary arrangement; the booms were not bound in any particular manner, nor was there any fixed distance between the craft. Sometimes 501 the same expedient was used for transport when the load was too heavy [171] for two canoes separately, a device which is said to have been used more commonly by the tribes of the outer coast than the Bella Coola. Canoes lashed together are termed ts-awandz.

Rafts, satskwl-a, consisting of rough logs fastened together with cross-pieces, were commonly used on the lakes of the interior, and occasionally for river work when canoes were unavailable and there was no time to make them. Another expedient in similar emergencies was to [177] make bark canoes, such as are still constructed by the Carriers. The Bella Coola regard the construction of these as definite copying, and do not profess to have as much skill as their teachers whose canoes, it is said, can be folded for portaging. There is a tradition that, many generations ago, a few clever Bella Coola knew how to make skin canoes.

THE PREPARATION OF CEDAR-BARK

314 Early spring is the time to sutskumls, that is, to gather the inner bark [221] of the cedar. Men occasionally assist in the task, though this is really [462] woman's work. The worker selects a small cedar, choosing one about [412] six inches in diameter, with smooth trunk and relatively free from knots. With a knife she makes a horizontal incision in the bark, two or three feet from the ground, sometimes girdling the sapling. Then she inserts her

STRING FIGURES

THE only form of pastime which it was practical to investigate in any detail was the construction of string figures. These seem to have no ceremonial or religious significance; they are made for recreation only, and it was found easy to learn a number while paving the way for other kinds of research. In fact, interest in them was one of the ways in which the writer became friends with a number of Bella Coola. As is to be expected, some individuals are more proficient in constructing complicated string figures than others, the old women being particularly adept. During the long delays which occur in all the dances it is a common sight to see an old crone teaching a group of young girls the figures which she herself learnt when young. Some men remember a number from childhood, but the making of designs with string is regarded as more fitting for girls and women. Songs accompany many of the figures, and the singing of these is considered an essential part of the construction. It was stated that many more figures were known long ago; in fact, several of those here recorded were only obtained after repeated efforts on the part of an old woman to reconstruct those which she had been shown when a child. No attempt was made to learn all the Bella Coola figures; a larger number could doubtless have been collected, but those here described are the ones most commonly made.

The nomenclature used is that described by Miss Haddon,[1] in itself following the method used by Rivers and Haddon. It will be assumed that the reader is familiar with this, including the meaning of the terms, "Opening A," "Position 1," and "Navaho." A string about four feet long will be found most convenient for making the Bella Coola figures.

1. A SALMON-TRAP

Double the loop; two strands now take the place of the usual one, but these will be referred to as a single string or loop. The figure can be made equally well with a string one-half the usual length.

Place string as a simple loop over left thumb and index finger and the right hand.

With right index finger hook down the string passing dorsally across left thumb and index finger and draw out to right, allowing right hand loop to slip over this hooked-down string.

Ai-mahsee: One of the four men to settle at Tól'a in the beginning of time.

aiqaiyee, "Weapons of War": The term applied to the presents distributed by the groom and his relatives to the bride and her price to assuring her home. [375] [431]

aiqaiyee: Gifts given to assist, even after bereavement, by the father of the future groom to the father of the future bride. [514] aiqaiyee: Wanted.

Aiqaiyee: Secondary supernatural woman; synonym for Sisiwanah.

Ahsaimaiyee: One of the men who came to earth at Mount Tsaiti in the beginning of time.

Ashkwali: Totem pole erected by the four archers at Ówa in the beginning of time.

ashkwi: Lying position with the thighs together such as is maintained for from days by an adolescent girl, and also by a widow or a widower. [376]

ahla: Sound sung in fast time. [333]

ahl: Rapid beating of time during which a dancer does not try to move his feet in rhythm with it. [333]

Ah'yaiyee: Daughter of the four archers at Sahla in the beginning of time.

ahsaiyee: Earlier dancer whose disguise becomes apparent through an accident.

ahsaiyee: Synonym for ganaiyee; one of the days of a potlatch, probably then the leaving the appearance of a masked representative of the deceased. [356]

ahsaiyee: 1—Night time.
2—That part of a Cannibal dance when songs are prepared in the middle of the night.

aha: Cross, separate singular.

Ahsaiyee: 1—One of Sisiwanah's sons in the beginning of time.
2—One of the four women to settle at Nanaiyee in the beginning of time.

ahsi-hoiyee: Control men behind the fire.

ahkahiyee: Dancer with handle for pounding stalks for fish-nets. [412]

Ahkwaiyee: Mountain on north side of the lower Bella Coola. [305]

ahkwaiyee: One who calculates the passage of time by watching the movements of the sun. [325]

Aha-yaiyee, "The Devourer of Most Killed by Another": Term used by lacrosse players. [325]

The beneficial purposes include: making a child grow up to be a good dancer, industrious, a swift berry picker, or a strong man; curing lung trouble; making the river snake where wanted; and two ways of stopping rain. The injurious purposes include: two ways of making a person grow up to be a thief, the causing of coldness and quarrelsomeness and the three ways of causing death.

The materials used actions used include: saliva of aspen leaves, a dead toad, sand with hair, with a red collar back face wipers, and with hair pieces of thimble berry shoots which were accidentally dropped while being eaten, saliva of a yellow jacket's nest, a living snake with pillages, beaver paws, in two instances, a skin bracelet from a beaver's foreleg, a dead wood-rat, a dead mouse, a grizzly bear's skin, a living owl squirrel with a bit of aspen twigs, setting fire to a wood-rat's house, and poking an owl bill.

To make a person a good dancer the saliva of the hind leaves of the aspen or trembling poplar were said to be useful, but Jackson said this may have been a joke. The Bellacoola Indians say the beaver dance. They never say that they trembles. When a baby was born, if the parents talked about it and the father desired that the baby grow up to be a good dancer, the mother or father got the beaver, burned them and put the saliva on the baby's hands, knees and elbows. When talking of this Jackson held his hands with the finger tips up and moved them as the Bellacoola do in dancing. Both rich and poor were dancers.

A baby girl would grow up to be industrious, it was believed, if the warm blood of a recently dead beaver were applied to her. The Bellacoola apparently observed the great industry of the beaver.

To make a baby girl grow up to be a fast berry-picking woman, the dog of skin from between two ears around a beaver's foreleg was put on her wrist and was left on until it wore off.

To make a boy grow up to be a strong man, a skin of the grizzly bear, was thrown over him, generally by his father.

For pillages on the lungs, more permanent than a simple cold, the patient experimented in something and some one merely mixed the fresh pillages with salmon eggs and put the mixture by the secrets of the Ki'uitl. She wore ornaments of red cedar-bark round her head, wrists, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair grown with eagle-down. She commanded the women to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, 'Whenever a person sees me your people shall dance as Ki'uitl. If you do not do so I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the Ki'uitl.'

Ever since that time the Bilqula dance the Ki'uitl. When a man has got Amalikstamal's sitting before her eyes he will invite the people to a Ki'uitl. A ring made of red and white cedar-bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over they must retire from the dancing house. Each Ki'uitl lasts three days.

The various dances performed by members of the Ki'uitl are also the property of the gentes, and the right of performing them is restricted to members of the gens. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the Sisaw'ka dances (see above), but belong to the gentes of the gens alone. They may, however, be lent and borrowed by members of the gens, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may outlaw the dance or the borrower may return it at any time. Membership of the Ki'uitl is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his Ki'uitl name, which he retains throughout life. Each gens has its peculiar Ki'uitl names, which are inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pi'pi until he was about seventeen years old obtained at his initiation the name of Tlaki'ell. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initiation; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice to the music of the Sisaw'ka, this initiation being concluded with a potlatch. But it is seems possible that he must 'dream' of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the Ki'uitl have to pass through a rigorous ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the Ulaqi'la (the Ki'uitl's of the Kwakiutl), the O'lag (the Ki'uitlall of the Kwakiutl), and the Di'ala (the Ki'uitlall of the Ki'itach). These grades are also hereditary. A Ki'uitl novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation.

When the ulaqi'la is initiated he goes into the forest, where he encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and anyone who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed, in order to serve as food for the ulaqi'la. The offer was accepted and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets made for the slave. The slave was killed, and the members of the ulaqi'la cedar decorated one half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There he latter is tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears to him and takes him up to the sun, where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn 424 owe my information regarding the clans, and who is a member of the 532 gens Ialit'stinit of the Talit'ne', stated that he had received the raven 614 when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received [115] the eagle. He hoped that his mother would give him the whole at his [556] next potlatch, and would at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his 424 secrets to his own children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new 551 secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a kū'nat 556 name, which remains through life, and a Xū'mānna name, which is 595 changed at these festivals. Thus, Nesk'ula'sta's (which is his kū'nat 614 name) Xū'mānna name was Ai'ūkamax'lus'ala', but at his next potlatch he intended to take the name of Kalit'kla. These names are also the property of the various clans, each clan having its own names.

When a man possesses several sisnā'k' secrets, he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their sisnā'k' secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of her clan.
When a person grows old, he gives away all his sisnā'k' secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more.
[426] The coat and the sisnā'k' carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular clan.

426 The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl.
586 The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die, the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die, his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person to a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so, he had to name the price which he was going to pay the owner in the stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

595 The kū'nat is presided over by a female spirit, called Asatlkatal-773 ū'ts. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from 776 February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she 535 opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Asatlkatal'ū invited her into her cave and taught her the secrets of the kū'nat. She wore ornaments of red cedar bark around her head, waist, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair strewn with eagle down. She commanded the 8:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1897

NEá Bellacoola NEá

women to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, "Whenever a person sees me, your people shall dance the kō'wist. If you do not do so, I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the kō'wist." 575 773 776 535

Ever since that time the Bī'tsela dance the kō'wist. When a man has seen Ā'mālkōtē'ni's sitting in front of her cave, he will invite the people to a kō'wist. A ring made of red and white cedar bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over, they must retire from the taboo house. Each kō'wist lasts three days. 575 776 535

The various dances performed by members of the kō'wist are also property of the clans, and the right to perform them is restricted to members of the clan. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the sisa'k-dances, but belong to the relatives of the clan, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may exclude the dance or the borrower may return it at any time. Membership of the kō'wist is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his kō'wist name, which is inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pū'pō until he was about seventeen years old, obtained at his initiation the name of Ō'kōtōn. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initiation; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the sisa'k, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But still it seems possible that he must "dream" of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the kō'wist have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the sīsō'ma (the kō'wists of the Kwakiutl), the ō'ōc (the ō'ōcists of the Kwakiutl), and the ōō'ma (the ō'ōcists of the Kwakiutl). These grades are also hereditary. A kō'wist novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation. 575 [551] [424] [551] [191] [534]

When the sīsō'ma is initiated, he goes into the forest, where he encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and anyone who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed in order to serve as food for the sīsō'ma. The offer was accepted, and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets was made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the sīsō'ma order devoured one half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter was tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears 575 785 787 [344]

Presently the guests assemble, those who are usual wearing on their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled, the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners, slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

A number of young lads, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a hamat friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

request X to have his son initiated, promising him financial assistance. 556* 575

These preliminaries have probably been commenced before nilaitsum; at any rate they are completed as soon as possible, so that a few nights later X is able to instruct a herald to invite the nusuk to his house. The singers are in attendance. The father, or other relative, of one of those about to be received into the ranks of the nusuk, expands in general terms the ancestral myth containing the song to be conferred, or will ask a fluent speaker to do this for him. Another follows, until myths have been recited for all. The singers listen attentively, knowing that without further instruction they are expected to compose two songs for each person, embodying a few salient points in the myth, without exposing the details. In point of fact, the singers have probably heard the myth on previous occasions. After a distribution of food, provided by X, the people disperse. [537] 533 556* 575

For several days the singers work at the songs. The principles governing their composition are identical for all types. At night, as he walks in the first, or at any other time, a singer constantly tries to compose tune. Others do the same, and at intervals they meet, within some lonely spot or in the back-room of a house. Each singer who has composed a tune hums out its tune, humming as he does so; then another gives his tune, and perhaps a third. After much discussion, which in some cases becomes acrimonious, it is decided what two tunes are the best for nusuk-nu. Words are then supplied, a matter of less difficulty, all the singers assisting. In this way the distinctive songs required are provided. When ready, the singers inform X of the fact.

X decides that on a certain night two of the initiates shall begin a period of confinement in the back-room of his house. This information is passed round in secret by the nusuk, and the initiate, whom it will be convenient to refer to as Y, is duly warned. At dusk a reliable nusuk is sent out to the woods behind the village with one of the large cone-shaped whistles.

556 adopted, probably as a prerogative obtained through mar-
575 riage, from the Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people. The diver-
177 sity in ritual supports this view. There was not sufficient [776] time for the procedure to become stabilized between the introduction of the concept and the dislocation of Bella Coola social life through the influence of the white man. It is also possible that the sutsinam was added to nusuk rites from the older a'alt society (I, p. 273).

532 Whatever may have been the history of the sutsinam, it
556 provides Y with a mask, or with two, if two figures have ap-575 peared. He guards them jealously, though secretly, throughout his life and uses them only on rare ceremonial occasions.
[969] It is one of these masks which will be brought out if one of his family gives a dramatic representation of his return after death.
[428] A mask of this type is sometimes willed, but the legatee alters the design before using it.

556 A short pause follows the singing of the second, or third,
575 song, during which some chief or chiefs may make a laudatory speech concerning Y's family history. Then the singers again [537] sing the first song, and nusuk members of the audience join in.
[533] Similarly, the second song is practised. These two are sung, time after time, until the nusuk have thoroughly mastered them. When the singers consider that this has been accomplished, they tell X, who communicates with the nusuk man outside who has the whistle, and again its eerie notes are heard.
[781] Some of the uninitiated, believing that the supernatural being [161] who gives potency to the ritual is at hand, hurriedly leave in fear. At the same time some of the nusuk conduct to the backroom the second initiate whose songs are to be sung that night.
The procedure in his case is identical with that described for Y.
Usually it is considered sufficient to exclude two on one night, though three may be attempted. When the songs of the last
have been sung, food is distributed and the people disperse.

A few nights later the same ritual is repeated for two more initiates, who join their predecessors in the back-room. Here they spend their time in idleness, the only essential being the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

preservation of an air of mystery by keeping out of sight of those who are not nusk. Food is brought to them, and members of the society are free to enter the room at any time. Some of the older ones enlighten Y and his fellows with regard to the secret rites, and especially to the human origin of the whistle. Proud of his new status, an initiate never dreams of transmitting this information to those who are not members of the society. As a privilege, the neophytes are sometimes allowed to go out at night, care being taken that no uninitiated person shall see them. The length of the period of confinement varies according to the number of young people to be admitted, and on the actual time of the potlatch; the minimum duration is about two weeks, the maximum, four months. Sometimes the tediousness is lightened by the arrival of carpenters who have chosen this secret place to work at the nusk masks. After all the initiates have been confined to the back-room, X continues to invite people to his house at frequent intervals to practise their songs. On each occasion food is distributed, so that the meetings are expensive to the host, but no donor grumbles about it, as thereby he establishes his prestige as a chief.

556* 575 [533]

THE VALIDATION OF NUSK NAMES

The next event in the validation of the initiates' nusk names,* a ceremony termed ne'ondim. X, with the assistance of his family, piles on the floor of his house the goods which he intends to use for this purpose. In the old days these consisted of skins, blankets, food, baskets, boxes, slaves (symbolized by stones), canoes (symbolized by sticks), and so on. Nowadays, money is used. Towards dusk a herald summons the people to X's house. For many years it has been customary to invite everyone, but it is said that long ago only the nusk would have been present. When all are seated,

553 556* 575 [208] [537]

* Validation of the neophytes' names is essential at the potlatch itself, but chiefs endeavour to display their wealth and generosity to their fellow-villagers as well. Consequently, though donors are eager to perform this rite, it can be continued entirely without affecting the potlatch.

553 without special places, X calls upon some eloquent friend to 556 direct the distribution of the money. This speaker states how 575 X is carrying out the rites incumbent on his noble and exalted [537] station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Snayuscila, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relatives of Y. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Next, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in like fashion the sums decided upon for each successive initiate.

Then the total amount is distributed among the guests by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives everyone the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, so that faulty division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the exact amount. If X finds out he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be an insult to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

[503]
[496]
[578]

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present; "it has flowed away to make good the boys' names" is the Bella Coola expression. A chief will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

nature will try to bestow a valuable present. If a man is too poor to give anything, he can avoid the obligation by not dancing when his tune is beaten out. The presents are piled together, and then the host, aided by several important chiefs, distributes them to the messengers, at the same time making laudatory speeches. The chief of the envoys receives more than the members of his crew.

Then the messenger-chief stands up and announces the names of those whom X has invited to his potlatch, using in each case the ancestral designation of the person summoned. Then the envoys, in a body, go to every house in the village. Probably all to be invited are present in the house of the chief, yet the messenger-chief must call out in the doorway of each house:

"Chief So-and-so, prepare your paddles and leave to-morrow."

Early next morning the messengers rouse those whom they have invited and, as a mark of respect, help them to carry their goods to the canoes. There is an attitude of shaming combined with that of deference, since those summoned will have been placed under obligations. They also take to their canoes their own recently acquired goods. Envoys and guests set out together in their respective craft, and only separate as they near Bella Coola.

ARRIVAL OF THE GUESTS

While the canoes containing the first party of guests remain at anchor to wait for high tide, the envoys proceed at once to X's house, now completely redecorated if not entirely rebuilt. There a huge fire is blazing, and members of the xaxai society are passing in and out, making ready for the ceremony. Both men and women beautify themselves by painting their faces in any designs they fancy, and by combing their hair and placing eagle down upon it. The guests at anchor lay planks across their canoes so as to form a dancing platform. Then, as the tide rises, the singers in the house beat out the tune of 585 In the gathering dusk all assemble in X's house; Y's relatives attend or not as they wish. X's father would feel insulted if anyone else should stay away without a valid excuse, but in point of fact everyone is eager for an evening's entertainment. The singers take their accustomed places behind the fire and the guests arrange themselves in the house without reference to rank. The musicians strike up the hsiat song of anyone present, and the person so indicated dances. The first tune used is frequently that of X's father, and the that of his mother, but there is no fixed rule about this. The singers [535] choose and beat out tune after tune, and guest after guest dances, but, since none of the supernatural being is present, the affair is of a non-sacred nature. After exhausting the most popular hsiat songs, the musicians beat out the tsesk songs of many of the guests who, in succession, dance to them; the songs of shamans are used in like fashion. Sometimes the singers continue until everyone present has danced, at other times they curtail the ceremony, as they think fit. When they decide to stop, they intimate this to X's father, who superintends the distribution to the guests of whatever kind of food has been provided.

537 585 [539] During the meal, a fluent speaker stands up and expounds on behalf of X's father the ancestral myth in which his son's ancestral name is embedded. Sometimes X's father acts as his own orator, but usually a herald is called upon. Only sufficient details are given to show the importance of X. The myth may either be one of the most ancient type dealing with the first settlement of this earth, or one of later date describing the exploits of X's famous ancestors; but in either case, as shown by the examples given in the last chapter, embodies an account of a marriage. It is always known, although not generally described, that at each of these several assets performed, their number varying between two and thirteen. The orator, when outlining the myth, assumes this fact of it, and always announces how many danced at that site, with the statement that there will be a like number on the morrow. In the same manner the fluent speaker outlines a myth belonging 537 to the ancestral family of X's mother, again with emphasis on 585 the dancers used by her ancestors. X, as a member of both ancestral families, can combine his rights from both sides, but it is customary for him to use no more than five or six performers. Should X have no claim to this privilege from either mother or father, an almost unthinkable situation, he is able [426] to borrow the prerogative of using some from friends. The sentiment on which this oration of myths is based is the one so often mentioned; it marks the close relationship between the future children and their noble ancestors of old, a source of strength to the former.

NE5 Bellacoola NE5

X's father now names those whom he wishes to assist him 585 on the following day. These are the dancers, who are chosen [595] primarily for their skill in dancing, and secondarily in accordance with their rank. With them he selects a number of persons to stand near and help or "cherish" them as they perform. He also asks the services of some of the women who are professional drumers; of the keeper of the marriage song of his [614] ancestral family; and, finally, of a number of men to sit near the singers and assist them with suggestions. It would be most exceptional for anyone so called upon to decline the honour. It is near morning by this time and the guests depart.

On the following morning, the actual wedding day, X's father calls to his house those selected the previous evening as dancers and their assistants. The former wear blankets decorated with small copper ornaments[1] and carry circular wooden [534] rattles provided with handles. Their clothing and rattles may be their own, but if they do not possess suitable attire, it is incumbent on X's father to provide them. Skins are piled up within the house, and some of these are said to "make soft the

[1] On the present time there is uncertainty as to the proper clothing of a marriage dancer. Several informants stated that it was a copper-decorated blanket, whereas others said that there was no special attire; one man claimed that an attempt was made to imitate the form and costume of X's first ancestor, and another that a [292] [535] [184] costume was used. Probably there was no uniformity in custom.

581 two of his female relatives were murdered at Kimsquit. The slayer was 553 never detected, but most of the Bella Coola believe that it was done by 578 one of Smanus's relatives, and that the dispute about names was quite 425 sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the [682] Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When this takes place, names are usually given outright, and not merely promised for the use of the future children.

585 After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y: The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have expounded parts of their origin myths, and promised names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bed covering" for Y. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. Her [597] father asks a fluent chief to address the assemblage, speaking as though he were Y. He says in effect:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bed covering."

These presents are the binding feature of the wedding. They are said to lock the girl in her husband's house, and accordingly are sometimes called, "rope fastenings." This is [577] only done when a woman is married for the first time.
[597] Another orator now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

"What we do today is no small matter. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

1:McDwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1945
NES Bellacoola NES

One of Y's relatives now whispers to X's father that it is time to lead away the bride. One of X's party, either man or woman, comes forward, takes Y by the hand and guides her to a place among X's people, close to X himself. Y's father gives the conductor presents, which are not returnable. Without further ceremony, X's party returns to his house, taking the bride with them. She and X usually sit close together for the rest of the rite, but their actions are really of slight importance. 575

An hour or so after the return from Y's home, a messenger is sent to invite her father and other relatives to X's house. The guests seat themselves behind the fire, and a number of others crowd in to watch and listen. X and Y are both present, but do not take any leading part in the ceremony. A large amount of food is given to the guests, provided, of course, by X's father, and, as they are eating, a few gifts, termed "food," may be given. Then an eloquent chief expounds in lofty style the manner in which X's ancestors were married in the days of antiquity. As soon as his speech is ended, X's father distributes to Y's relatives presents, which are spoken of as "clothing." Theoretically, the presents "become nothing" for this purpose, but in reality they are returned later on as a means of increasing the prestige of each recipient. In consequence, care is taken to ensure that industrious individuals receive more than others. These presents are often of considerable value, since they not only mark the noble sentiments of X's family with regard to him, but they are also a sound financial investment on behalf of X, whose wife will help him at future potlatches. Goods received as "food" at the meal are restored in the same fashion as the "clothing." This completes the marriage ceremony. Y's relatives often stay for some time longer in X's house, but gradually go home as they think fit. [537]

That night X and Y sleep together.

It is contrary to custom for X's relatives to hoard the goods which they have received from Y's relatives as "food 553 present is made. The recipient may either be X himself or 556 one of his relatives who has conferred a gift on one of Y's 583 family. The goods are taken inside, counted, displayed, and the same announcement made. These presents are given away by X the same evening, so that the only practical advantage that he receives is that the ultimate recipients make their returns, if any, to him. He makes no recompense to Y's relatives for these.

[537] A fluent orator next speaks on behalf of Y's father to the following effect:

"Please, ye people, listen to my words. This is an important occasion, hearken to what I have to say. Long ago our first ancestors were married, as X and Y have been, and it is fitting that we should make the name ..... live again in Y. Three years [or as long as the name has been dormant] it has been dead, as if living with the ghosts beneath the earth. Now it shall stand up again in Y; henceforth we use it for her. Come forth ..... [using Y's new name], your father relays you from X for fifty blankets [for example]."

Y may be anywhere; the statement "come forth" is merely symbolical. The fifty blankets are piled outside the house and the spectators, of whom many have gathered to witness the transaction, know that that number of blankets has been given with reference to that name. In some cases the wife is rebought three, four, or even more times for one name, either repeatedly by her father, or successively by her father and other relatives, or several names may be acquired by the different repurchasings. For instance, at one potlatch not many years ago a woman obtained the names Lálikt, Xwalen, Smaiu-a, and Ailumka. As with men, some women prefer to have one very strong name, rather than diffuse their importance over a number. In this particular case the four designations were received from different relatives. At each repurchase the call is raised:

"Come forth ..... your brother [uncle, or whatever relative it may be] relays you from X for ....."

but even if unaware of the fact, they realize that some supernatural, invisible visitor has arrived.

Heralds go from house to house, and sometimes to adjacent villages as well,[8] inviting the people to pay a farewell visit to the dead man who will soon leave them; in this invitation the ɬɬaok name of the deceased is used. The guests assemble at once, irrespective of their rank or membership in the ɬɬaok society. To mark their grief, female relatives pull out tufts of their hair, and both men and women of the immediate family cut their hair short. The body, either in its coffin or covered with blankets, is placed between the central fire and the back-room, immediately behind the place where the singers take their stations. When all are present, a son or other near relative who is also a fluent speaker, stands up and expounds how the Chief, meaning Mulakila, has come to visit the dead man, and how all should try to understand the song he has brought.[9] A hidden ɬɬaok has been blowing a whistle intermittently, and the singers pretend to be able to understand words of a song in its notes. In reality they have prepared in advance the new one which they now beat out, accompanied by their voices. The theme either describes the coming of the supernatural visitor, or recounts the number of potlatches given by the deceased, and the manner in which these will make smooth the path whither he is going in the same way that distributed goods validate a chief's seat in this world. This song is practised and improved upon amid the booming of the whistle as if the singers were constantly gaining new ideas and embellishments from the words of the supernatural visitor. Sometimes a few incidents are added from the ɬɬaok myth. After several repetitions, a relative of the dead man asks the singers to beat out the latter's ɬɬaok songs, as many of them as are remembered from the time he was first initiated into the so-

[8] The Bella Bella are said to invite foreign guests to this ceremony.

[9] Sometimes the people are present when the coming of Mulakila, heralded by whistling and a thump on the roof, takes place. There are variations in this, as in all other ɬɬaok rites.

the hole in the roof, ponderously and slowly, until its talons grip the "body." In the same gradual fashion it carries this upwards until, just before the burden disappears through the roof, one of the principal singers leads his fellows and the audience in calling out: 575 766

"Ye··," which has the significance of, "May you have a safe passage whence you came and whither you are going."

As soon as the bird has disappeared, its notes are heard from above, growing gradually fainter as the actors blow their whistles less violently. An eloquent nuuk stands up and expounds how the deceased's crest has come down from above to carry away his body, and often mentions incidents in the ancestral myth to explain why this bird had appeared. A young man is sent up to replace the roof boards and the hidden accomplices rejoin the audience unostentatiously. The corpse itself remains hidden in some back corner of the house where it was concealed at the time the dummy was seized, so that nothing indicates what has taken place.

The relatives must give presents to all who have witnessed this ceremonial prerogative. These are now distributed without regard to the rank of the recipient; such gifts are not returnable and are said to be, "What Has Been Shaken Off," like dust from the departing body. A meal, likewise provided by the kinsmen of the deceased, is next served, and as the people are eating, it is customary for senior nuuk to make laudatory speeches, extolling the dead chief and comforting the survivors by reminding them of the way in which he will be looked after in virtue of his ancestral traditions. This procedure may continue for several hours, and it is only when no one else wishes to speak that the people disperse. [552] [537]

It is not easy to comprehend the attitude of the Bella Coola to this rite. Some influential nuuk state emphatically that in former days it was possible to carry it out so realistically that the uninitiated were deceived, and never suspected that the actual corpse was later on buried in secret by the singers, carpenters, and nuuk. On the other hand, those who do not 575 766 781 grave carrying a spruce bough in his hand. He touches with it the edge where he is standing, then, in survey order, the east, south, and west margins. This circuit is repeated four times and the branch tossed away to westward. This essential ceremony is based on a belief that the lives, or perhaps the spirits, of the grave-diggers have been drawn from them into the grave and are in danger of being pressed down by the coffin. Should this occur, they would have short lives. The spruce branch enables the supernatural elements to leave the cavity and return to their owners who suffer no ill effects. Anyone, other than a grave-digger, can perform this rite.

The coffin is now lifted into the grave, care being taken that the corpse faces east. As already described, it is in a squatting position with knees almost on the ground. Boards have been prepared in advance, and with these the grave-diggers make a roof-like covering, placing at each corner a stone weighing from ten to fifteen pounds, to prevent the ghost from returning to trouble the survivors. Earth is thrown in on top of the boards, and as it falls the wailing breaks out dolorously in a final crescendo of mourning. If a chief has been buried, his fellows sometimes sing a so-ko song. At this time it is proper for one or more chiefs to rise and speak. No one is required to do so, nor is there any rule as to the order in which they make their remarks. The first speaker is usually a prominent man related to the survivors, though seldom a son, brother, or other near relative of the deceased. A speech is generally addressed in part to the spirit of the dead person, telling it where to go; in part, to the mourners. For a dead child, emphasis is laid on the fact that although he did not live long enough to be incorporated into his ancestral myths on earth, this will be done for him in his future home. In conclusion, an appeal is often made to Nqumkin, under the name of Tsaxalala, to take pains that the spirit of the dead is given its rightful place in Nuxalk-a, in the section where its first forbears were created, and whether the spirits of its dead ancestors have returned since the beginning of time.

sing of time. The following speech was made by an elderly Bella Coola chief at the funeral of his great-granddaughter in June, 1910:

"Granddaughter!* Go with your grandmother* to the mountain above Tsimsil where my first [ancestral] ancestor came to earth. Go to the mountain across the river where Kalt[illegible] descended; go to the north where your ancestor found a copper house with a raven inside; go to the Skeena where another of your early ancestors found a whale; go to all the places where your forefathers experienced the incidents recorded in our myths; go and be happy.* I do not wave these ever-recurring deaths in my family, but I am helpless. I hope that Sisinguiaum will cease hunting us."

Turning to the Carrier Indians who were present, the old man continued: "Thank you for coming twice within two days to share our grief."

Turning back towards the grave, he went on:

"I have made ready the road for you.* Your grandfather* and I are grieved; our families became united when your parents married, and the bond was renewed by your birth. Now it is lost. When you were born, I rejoiced; now I am sorry. You are all right; you cannot fall because you are supported* by the names and fame of your father and mother, your grandfather and grandmother, your uncles and aunts, and your other ancestors who have passed away here to Sunset. You met with them in your own village where is located your power from the experiences of your forefathers.

*The term, always very used, although the child was really a great-granddaughter.

*The grandmother had been buried two days previously.

*One of the few people to reach this rank.

*The places and people questioned were all described in the myths of the dead child's ancestral family.

*A reference to goods distributed by the speaker at a memorial held a few days previously when it was certain that the child would soon die.

*The child's mother's father.

*Apparently, therefore, a vault having the sense of physical support. The implication is that the deceased relatives are willing to pull a dead child into the presence of their father is enough to persuade any one of them, including the dead child, from falling.

They will look after you and, being dead, they will be able to do so properly. You will be strong indeed. I am heavy with grief. My grandchildren show more to mother me to [illegible], otherwise I would go to [illegible]! Now that you have gone,[2] may become light-headed and depart. No, I have other grandchildren and great-grandchildren. I will bear up and be a man, and show myself the chief that I am by right.[3]

During this speech the mourners remained seated on the ground, many of the women wailing at intervals and the men listening with more or less attention except those who were filing in the grave. Once or twice the speaker hesitated for a suitable word and suggestions were called out to him.

As the old man finished speaking and sat down, another chief arose.[4]

"Children," he said, addressing the parents of the dead child, "You have indeed suffered misfortune. A few days ago, your mother[5] died; today, your daughter. Perhaps it is all for the best. Remember how many ancestors who have gone before will be waiting to receive the child, she will be well cared for. Death comes to one, chief or commoner, but do not despair even at this double misfortune. Your mother[6] never did an evil action to anyone, never said a harsh word to anyone, try to imitate her. But I have neither father nor mother. They are both dead; we all go the same way.[7]

In conclusion he urged the step-father of the grieving father, husband of the woman who had died a few days previously, to bear up.

As the second speaker finished, a third arose and spoke briefly.

"I am sorry," he said, "for [illegible][8] in his grief today. We have

There is no doubt that conditions of this nature make the mourning relatives to bear up under their grief. This fact was emphasized by several Bulu Chiefs, and in addition the writer was able to observe it on several occasions. They readily responed to suggestions of any kind and unhesitatingly derive comfort from the bereavers comments of influential chiefs.

Speeches of this general nature are always delivered as the grave is being filled in. Sometimes this work is finished before all who wish to do so have expressed themselves, sometimes the mourners are so short that they are ended before all the earth has been thrown back. When the hole has been filled to ground level, it is stamped down and the surplus earth scattered out of sight among the bushes, no mound being thrown up.

Great care is always taken to prevent the return of the ghost. In addition to the weighting with stones already described, other methods are used before the funeral party leaves the cemetery. Heavy boards are usually laid flat over the grave and rocks piled on them lest the way up from below. A further precaution to the setting upright of four stakes, one at each corner of the hole, and fastening ropes of cotton bark between them along the east and west sides of the grave. The significance of this is not fully understood, except that the ghost cannot pass the cords. Four spears sayings are cut and placed either between the grave and the village, or one on each side of the hole, their sharp points form an effective barrier.

While these precautions are being taken, any clothing and utensils brought to the grave and not already consumed are thrown on the fire and allowed to blaze brightly. The ashes prerogatives connected with the ceremony. The actual recounting of the myths may be done by a fluent speaker on behalf of the bereaved man, and when he has finished speaking, it is proper for several of his peers to make complimentary speeches, leading the future donor for his interviews. Food is then served and the gathering breaks up.

The preliminaries of a memorial potlatch do not differ from those of a ordinary one. There is the same counting and recounting of goods, the same giving and receiving of presents, the outstanding and borrowing. When at last the donor is ready, he herald call his fellow-villagers to his house for commencement of the arrangements and allotment of the work. As at a potlatch, food is provided on a lavish scale, and there is the usual sham-fight with a borrowing-man ending in the destruction of part of the house. Then the carpenters receive their instructions; some to make different sections of the new longhouse, some to paint ancestral designs on the front and back wall, and some to make the various objects required.

The last difference between a memorial and an ordinary potlatch is apparent at this allotment of work. Instead of a totem-pole to record the glories of the donor's ancestry,* carpenters are requested to make memorial-posts for the dead relative for is being commemorated. These are erected in the cemetery near the grave and are of three kinds, although it is usual for all three to be set up for a single chief.

The last consists of a wooden post carved with the design of one crest of the deceased's totem (see Plates 19 and 20). These figures are usually representations of the bird or animal chosen and by his first ancestors; it is customary to portray the one world through the father on the right, that world through to mother on the left. Instead of a cloak, the figure may portray the post down which ancestral his first ancestor to the beginning of time, or Mount Nuxalk in human form, wearing a broad-rimmed hat as he did before he turned to

* When a construction of a new house and the painting of new designs is also undertaken

Such an adoption occurs only when the deceased was the owner of a Bella Bella myth and the song in question had been used to renew a real or fictitious relative. It is contrary to custom to use the tune or words of a song not composed for a member of the deceased's ancestral family.

The actual delivering of invitations by the envoys to the desired guests does not differ from the manner already described, except that they are asked "to come to visit the sick [donor]." The significance is, of course, that the mourner's condition is that of a patient. To indicate the reason of their visit, guests at a memorial potlatch always wear a little dyed cedar-bark around their heads.

On arrival, the first party of foreign guests is conducted to the donor's house, where they make themselves comfortable in the section allotted to them by the heralds. An elderly Bella Coola chief who is a famous orator has been asked by the donor to speak, and he rises to do so as soon as his fellow-villagers have entered and taken their places. No set phrases are used, but the speaker usually begins by reminding all present of the way in which their ancestors were created in Heaven, and how all must return thither. It is an occasion on which eloquence is essential, and the speaker delights in using as many archaic words and rhetorical expressions as possible, with constant reference to religious beliefs and ancient history as recorded in mythology. Then he speaks of the death which is the occasion of the ceremony. If the deceased were an old man, he is referred to by a special term not in common usage, nuhl-ds, which implies wisdom and respect as well as extreme age. The orator states that he has fallen, using the term ḡayda, normally applied to the thunderous crash of some mighty tree. He speaks of a young chief as ooʼlitsdis, dwarf-fir, a person who has been burned down by the supernatural Carpenters. He continues by describing the works of the deceased, the number of potlatches he gave and the manner in which his name was known to many tribes. Finally he tells of the donor's grief, and of how this "sickness" has been alle-

537 viewed by the presence of welcome guests. Mention is frequently made of the journey taken by the dead man to the [illegible] of his ancestral myths. In addition to being an orator, the speaker must also be a nuxalt chief, since it is felt that [illegible] can have the necessary assurance and poise to refer to these most sacred and important subjects. During the speech, [illegible] blow eagle down over the heads of all present.

Food has been prepared in advance, and as soon as the speaker has finished, the hereditary call the guests to partake of it. The first course is then distributed, [illegible] with [illegible] guests. Speeches are sometimes delivered during this part of the meal, as well as at the second course, [illegible] with more [illegible] guests. If the guests have arrived during the afternoon, there is no delay between the feast and the ritual that follows, but if they have come during the morning, there is a gap until the evening. Visitors usually time their arrival for the early part of the afternoon.

537 The next event is a speech from one of the foreign chiefs, phrased in [illegible] terms similar to those used by the Bella Coola orator. He speaks of the manner in which the supernatural Carpenters have buried the deceased, but reminds his hearers that this is because Hpamlim has decreed it, therefore all must be for the best. He refers to the dead man's [illegible], and to the manner in which this guise will be available to him. During the day, the singers have been careful to learn the tune of a mourning song used by the ancestral family of each foreign chief likely to speak. This they now hear sung, often assisted by some of the guests, and always accompanied by their singing. We are [illegible] to accompany the song; it is merely a verbal mark of sympathy, implying that the speaker himself knows the grief occasioned by death, and, also, that he is sufficiently important to be able to use a mourning song. If, as is usually the case, there is more than one influential chief in the party, a second rises to speak, expressing no difference from the sentiments expressed by his predecessor. Another mourning song is sung for him in the same way. Sometimes as many as five or six speeches are made, each followed by a song of the same type. In such circumstances it is impossible for the Bella Coola musicians to learn all the tunes, but if five or six chiefs are present, it implies the presence of a large delegation among whom are always a number of singers. It is they who really bear out the tunes, assisted by their Bella Coola confreres. When the last song has been sung, the guests present their boxes with gifts brought for the purpose. The donor himself receives the most valuable, but all the Bella Coola are remembered, chiefly to a greater extent than commoners. Such gifts are not to be returned; in fact, to do so specifically, especially soon after the receipt, would be insulting. After the distribution the evening concludes with the usual meal.

This ritual is repeated on the arrival of every group of guests. It is uncertain whether or not all the mourning songs are again heard on what the song of the final speaker of the last group. This seems to have been done occasionally, and the distribution of presents by the guests likewise postponed. Just before the gathering breaks up, the hostess call out: "Ainainamamaqa."

This serves as intimation that the Bella Coola rites will take place the following morning, and the guests prepare accordingly. Occasionally, when a man is poor, a memorial potlatch is held without the presence of foreign guests.* In such cases the proclamation just described are, of course, omitted and the above call marks the commencement of the ceremony.

The rites day the guests gather in the donor's house, clad in their best. The musicians are in attendance, each complete with the proper mask. In many cases several of these very miniature totem-poles, carved to represent bird or animal chiefs assumed by the donor's ancestors, and which will now be the turn of the one who has recently died. As soon as all have taken their places, an eloquent chief whom all has been requested for the purpose stands up and recounts the dead's ancestral myth in some detail, mentioning the source and meaning of the ancestors' mythe and the designs of the totem poles. Then he continues to the effect that the chief will "cry" by relating the history of his ancestors, which is also the history of the journey taken by his kinsman, and that this recital will shove him up. The word used for this, mutlaqa, is the one commonly employed for raising a heavy burden with the aid of a lever. Then the singers begin to hum over the first of the mourning songs, accompanying it with their voices and assisted by as many of the audience as are familiar with words and tune. Every effort is made to make the singing as impressive as possible to add dignity to the recital of the journey taken by the person who is being commemorated. The guests listen attentively and are partially impressed by the ancestral history of the dead and his family. All the songs that have been prepared are sung in succession in the same manner. The lack of dancing distinguishes this type of ceremony from all others and adds somewhat to its impressiveness.

When the last song is the proper time for validating young relatives of the dead as successors. One of the miniature totem poles, which are light enough to be carried in the hands, is brought from the back room and given to the boy on whom the prerogative is being conferred. An eloquent speaker explains the meanings of the designs as displayed and enough of the family's ancestral history to make clear whence, and how, they were obtained. The singers begin to hum close closely, and the youth endeavours to keep time with his feet, while he continues to hold the pole.

Meanwhile the dead and his immediate relatives have been arranging the plan of procedure with the inevitable counting and re-counting. In a potlatch, a Bone speaker is commissioned to hold up the objects, once whence they have been obtained,

He did not also the necessity obeying her "to make good the pelt" of her children. For this purpose they decided to give a copper and a sum of money; it was impossible to learn the exact amount. Joe told Captain Schooner of their intention.

Hence soon the body was brought in a canoe from the cemetery to its closed coffin and fixed ashore at a convenient spot near the cemetery. Those running the canoe were young men who happened to be at the cemetery, irrespective of whether or not they were related to Jessie. The coffin was laid on a grassy place and Captain Schooner seated himself beside it. People were passing and repassing, some sat down for a time, then moved off to dinner. Occasionally, a woman would sit and wail, the most constant being Reuben's married daughter; Captain Schooner moved around talking to his friends amidst the mute wailing. About 1.30 p.m. everyone in the village had assembled, including a number of Carrier Indians, anxious to see the sight. Captain Schooner withdrew to his house after asking Bobby Bobby to summon the chiefs to meet him there. The messenger, who then stood as herald, went around the gathering whispering to each. In addition to those notified at the cemetery the preceding evening he called all the older and more influential Bella Coola, Albert King, Samuel King, Joe Williams, Judson Woody, Alec Lewis, Lame Charlie, Judas, and Nibachalcoomer. Captain Schooner requested the last named, as important chief, to take charge of the ceremony. To this time Samuel King told Nibachalcoomer, who informed the others, what had been arranged for his daughter and they agreed that it was good. It was widely assumed that George Nelson would be delighted, possibly he had been on friendly terms with the girl for some time. Joe Williams also told Nibachalcoomer the two business propositions that he intended to carry out, the return of the money to Captain Schooner, and the whipping of his daughter. Nibachalcoomer informed the people concerned. At this meeting it was decided that various chiefs should speak after the Christian service at the grave.

was not carefully observed. Those wishing to dig took turns with the tools; there was no supervision, and no orders given. When the grave was ready, Jim Pollard asked Judas to perform the rite with the spruce bough, which he did with a branch brought by one of the youths. The young men lowered the coffin into the grave while the band continued to play. The missionary then read the Christian burial service, after which he withdrew. Some of the young men brought planks from old houses near-by, sawed them to the size of the grave and laid them over the coffin as a cover. At this juncture Judas, one of the oldest and most conservative of the Bella Coola, rose to speak. First he offered consolation to the mourning relatives by pointing out that all must travel the same road. Then he spoke to Jessie, calling her not to linger, but to travel back the path of her ancestors from generation to generation until she reached the place where they first came down from above, and dance to ascend to Nuxwatsa. It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of the speech, which was punctuated by calls of "Yo." from the male Bella Coola. The next speaker was Jim Pollard, the most influential Kwakiutl and a personal friend, though not a relative, of Captain Schooner's.

"Go," he said to the dead woman, "Go to the localities from which came your first forefathers in the beginning of time. There you will find your most valuable ancestral possessions. Go at once, do not linger and lose yourself on the road from generation to generation."

Turning to George Nelson, he went on, "Do not be downhearted, all of us must travel the same road. It was made by no man, it is the work of Hamatsa."

Looking back once more to the grave, he said, "In Kwaqa we bury many illustrious relatives of yours. You will be among friends, whereas we are left to lament your departure."

It was impossible to write down the words at the time and the above record is not literally correct, although it expresses the gist of the speech.

Captain Schooner whispered to Robert Hood, another of the

for the Carrion and other foreigners. The cook began to ladle the rice into basins provided by Captain Schooner; these were taken by some of the younger men who poured helpings into the dishes of the guests. Spoons had been forgotten, and there was delay until these were provided by slivers split from a block of wood for the purpose. Contrary to ancient usage, no attempt was made to serve food to the guests in order of their rank. Men, women, and children were sitting everywhere, the infants kept moving around and crying continually throughout the performance, but no one seemed to be disturbed thereby.

When everyone had eaten, Nidoo-Indiwoman, who had been sitting facing the other singers, bent on the floor to commence proceedings and then rose to speak. He asked the help of all to make the ceremony a success, and then message the grief of the bereaved relatives.

Joe Williams and his daughter had taken their places on the right-hand side of the hall and had requested Willie Black, a fluent speaker and influential chief, to assist them in arranging the financial transactions. They spread a blanket on the floor on which the bills were counted, and beside this Willie knelt. Joe gave him a sum of money, which was counted and re-counted; Willie then held it up to the rain hope that it could be seen by everyone in the hall. He announced the amount, also that it was to relieve (the divorced) Mrs. George Nelson from her late husband, and that it would "make clean the place where she sat." A young man delivered the money to George who added it to the general stock for later distribution. Then a copper was produced, held up, and presented to him for the same purpose. Meanwhile Joe, assisted by his mother and other relatives, had been counting the money which they proposed to give to Captain Schooner in settlement of the previously contracted debt. One hundred and fifty dollars were produced and handed to Willie Black, who held them up and announced that it was in return for the Kow given by Captain Schooner on a previous occasion to Joe Williams, his wife, his son, his daughter, his mother, and his stepfather. The bills were taken by one of the younger men to Captain Schooner, who accepted them without showing either gratitude or the reverse; this errand was a matter that concerned the Williams family, not the Schooners. After a short delay, Billy Pollard moved over to the group and spoke to Joe and Willie Wacik, to whom he gave $10. The latter stated that this sum, which he held up, and a horse, which was not produced, were being given to George Nelson to relay his (divorced) wife. Billy is not related to the women, but had long been friendly and wished to show in making good the path for his children. This matter had not been previously broached. The choice of Willie Wacik as announcer was made merely because he was a fluent speaker and, as a chief, had the necessary self-confidence to act fittingly.

After these preliminaries, the main rite was begun. Joe Pollard, an eloquent chief unrelated to any of the principals, spoke at some length describing the journey taken by Jessie to visit the spirits of her ancestral myths. He was followed by a Bella Bella chief who happened to be in Bella Coola at the time. In the Chinook jargon he first expressed his sympathy and support for Captain Schooner because he was carrying out the living rites, then asked leave to speak in Bella Bella because he found it difficult to express himself in Chinook. He described the journey which the deceased had taken owing to her membership in the ancestral family of her mother, a Bella Bella woman. We can paid much attention to the speeches; in fact, it was impossible at the back of the hall to hear what was said owing to the chattering and crying of children.

After considerable delay, the singers decided it was time to sing the first mourning song. It had never before been used, although the composer, Billy Pollard, had prepared it several years earlier and had mostly sketched the words during the morning after consulting Captain Schooner about his ancestral myths. The singers had learnt text and tune during the rehearsal a few hours before. It was impossible to record it in detail; in outline, it consisted of the words:

and dividing here as divide it. Harry Schooner is neither dominant nor capable, and finally acted only as clerk, as the actual division rested with Captain Schooner, Boulton, and George. David Nelson would normally have played a prominent part, but he was absent owing to the illness of his infant daughter. Samuel King joined the group, bringing with him two coppers, two rifles, and a sum of money, and whispered the purpose of the consultation.

After the usual pause, George Nelson and Captain Schooner, the latter substituting for the absent Dan Nelson, stood up and walked around the hall carrying those coppers and two rifles. Then they returned to their places.

Nelsonhalloonner had been asked by Captain Schooner to act as arrangeur on account of his good voice and self-confidence. He joined the group in the corner to call out whatever they whispered to him. Then he stated that one of the coppers just displayed had been given to George Nelson to relay from him his wife, Jim Williams' daughter. He explained that the other two, as well as the rifles, were presents from Samuel King, endorsed by his brother, Albert, and his sister, Mrs. Alexander Chalmers, to George Nelson in consequence of the latter's marriage to Samuel King's daughter. The arrangement having been initiated by the relatives of the girl, it was fitting that they should give the first presents.

Captain Schooner had then placed to expend Dyes to relative the return of his dead daughter. He will gave him Dyes for the purpose, and when Jim Williams returned Dyes, he decided to use only Dyes of the savings, making Dyes in all. To this Boulton added Dyes, Harry Sun, and Dan Nelson Sun, increasing the total to Dyes. George considered what he had received from Jim Williams for the repurchase of the latter's daughter, as well as what Samuel King had just given him. Samuel added to the pile some money belonging to Jessie.*

* The writer could not learn why the money had not been expended and no other presumption. The reason was felt that the Sun Yuh, were due, though a portion was Black, the grade of a Sun means such to Blackhouse and to Sing Sin or a company that Sunh Sin or Sunhouse from Sin Sun.

[176] [177] tomes. The night's ceremony concludes with a meal and the admonitions of the mandals.

No further description is needed of things taking place the next day, that of marriages, when a ceremonial song is composed, again dealing with Q's powers, endowed for masks to use. The evening's ceremonial does not in so long as that of dances.

[178] [179] [180] The next day, gallus, the supporters sit at the masks, some of which must be finished by nightfall. Late in the evening both initiates and uninitiated spare themselves by painting and washing, as this time the song men provide pieces of music music for their female friend. As already described, the initiates are the first to move followed by the uninitiated when all is ready. In Q's mythology are the masks [181] of an inner circle of Q's supernatural pieces suspended by cords of dried cedar-bark from a shaping jie that stretches from the floor on the base of the back-rooms the cross-beam behind the fire. It is said, although the informant could not guarantee the truth of the statement, that ing ago masks had to be displayed on this dance, though it unusual at others. It is a serious and sacred time, one at which frivolity is quite out of place, and the mandals are in readiness to punish any offenders. One very old informant told of being seen a marshal strike down and kill a doctor from another house for [182] [183] [184] holding intercourse with a woman on this ejie. The heralds may enter the dance, supporting and encouraging the remarks of the mandals, the frenzy of these functionaries always adds responsibility to the success of any Bella Cola rite. On this occasion Q and the dancer of Nuhlyum met partners, followed by those who have danced in form years, according to the desire of the singers; least in the case, when many initiates have performed, the rite may continue almost till dawn, for all must dance. After the departure of the uninitiated the initiates are blessed, while a cerebal admonition [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] supposed to have taught them, he appears, supported by two kokwitai, and attempts to dance, but is too feeble to do more 575* than be assisted around the fire, feebly shaking his hands. He retires, but comes forth once more as the singers beat out the song of regular kwiai type composed for him and which his fellows have practised. If two have been composed, he appears a third time. After X has finally withdrawn, the usual procedure in the usual manner, by the dancing of every kwiai who has had a call in time to his two songs. It is late before all have danced; then the uninitiated are given a little food and sent [574] away. The kokwitai sit more leisurely, and listen to the admonitions of the marshals. On account of the solemnity of the 575* occasion, their words of wisdom are even more grandiloquent than usual. The following may be regarded as a typical address: 532

"You have done well, ye kokwitai, in thus carrying out the ceremony so admirably. I thank you. You have done well X, you have done as our fathers did. None of you must ever forget the precepts and example of our fathers who have handed down this rite from dim antiquity. Perhaps when we marshals are dead some of you will become careless and want to alter the ceremonial. Do not dream of anything so foolish. The proper method is that which you have just seen. Try to other."

When the marshals have finished, X dances once again, and the weary kokwitai at length disperse.

The next day, or rather later in the same day, for it is long 575* after midnight before the ceremony is completed, is rehearsed. 796* Many of the kokwitai assemble in X's house about four o'clock 532 in the afternoon to try on the masks and attend to the innumerable details. A representation of Ana'ilitsadzaie is always prepared, as well as those of Ayaoxim, Sacoxdzaie, and Sacadzaie. The last-named is the "Wise One," "He of Whom Questions are Asked," the supernatural being who decides [776] points of ritual in the dances in the land above. No paint is used on his mask, but a coloured effect is obtained by means cosq'. If the Bella Coola were strictly logical, one should expect them to conceive the upper surface of cosq' as being convex. Instead, it is considered a flat surface, very similar to the earth, and no explanation is given of what fills in the spaces between the dome, concave as viewed from this world, and the upper plane which could rest only on the peak of the dome. But logical accuracy is not a Bella Coola characteristic. This flat land is called dlowa'dl or cosq' nemalhqaiil. It is illuminated by a second sun, shining on it as the sun does on the earth. Far in the east of this upper region are extensive tide-flats. This land above is the home of many supernatural beings, who will be described in due course. The relative position of the sun to this upper world is ill-defined. According to some accounts, it travels by clearly marked trails on the surface, and a transparent dome is postulated to explain how its light reaches this earth. Others state that it moves like a bird or flying canoe through the space between the world and the dome-sky above. On many of these points there is a striking difference of opinion, which the Bella Coola explain by saying that their information is derived from ancient stories, which are personal possessions, and that no one knows the beliefs of his fellows. A co-ordinated theology, as Boas points out, has not evolved among the Bella Coola.

The sky, as it may be called if the reader will bear in mind that it is the underside of a flat land, was not always in its present condition. The Bella Coola say that long ago the supreme god instructed his Carpenters (I, p. 31) to make a sky. They started from the eastern extremity of the earth, but after a considerable part of the dome had been erected, it fell with a thunderous crash, because no supporting posts had been set up. The part that escaped this calamity is called Sabaldzam. Undiscouraged, the Carpenters continued their work with the assistance of posts and so built the sky as it is seen today. Then the supports were taken away.

As already stated, a sun shines on the land above. As that sun by contrast is attached to the land above, so is this upper

* 996 According to the general Bella Coola belief the supernatural ones may be classified as anthropomorphic beings, zoomorphic beings, and supernatural members of the vegetable and mineral kingdoms.

ANTHROPOMORPHIC BEINGS

The Bella Coola agree that the most important of their supernatural beings is Alpuntiów, the supreme deity, maker of men and animals. He is most commonly known by this name but he has other appellations with reference to his various functions. The word Alpuntiów is said to be derived from sapuntiów, "foreman," or "chief." He is chief of the supernatural beings. Other names by which he is known are as follows:

Sawáiktle, a word derived from saw, the Sun. This term is used almost as commonly as Alpuntiów.

* 996 ● 534 Smaiaiktile, "The Story Man," because Alpuntiów created the ancestral myths at the same time that he created mankind. The supreme deity is called Smaiaiktile with reference to his membership in the hamat society of the supernatural beings.

Smaiaiatle, "From Whom Come, and To Whom Belong, All Myths." As creator of the highly valued myths, the supreme deity is owner of them.

* 996 Smaoiktlih, "The Wise One," "The Thoughtful," or "The Owl with Great Mental Ability."

[601] Mawhaic, a word supposedly derived from mahe, "Father," with the suffix kaic as a term of endearment. This is used in praying to Alpuntiów.

[601] [102] Tátá, "Father," the term for father used by a child; this, like the last, is used in prayer.

what is probably a moosehide, with salmon painted on it, symbolic of his guardianship of fish for the benefit of mankind. In other respects Nuxmāt-a has no peculiarities. Behind the house is an enormous tree, Tsunsu-iaqim, in the branches of which live innumerable owls.

After this description of Nuxmāt-a, it is logical to return to its master, Alqantām. Guiding the sun is his most spectacular occupation, but he also governs the movements of moon and tides. Powerful though he is, he continues to take an interest in the doings of mankind whom he created. Prayers are commonly addressed to him, and a certain type of shaman is believed to receive power direct from him. Other supernatural beings may work weal or woe to a Bella Coola, but he feels it is done with the sanction of Alqantām. At every winter solstice he enters Nuxmāt-a, where supernatural beings from all parts of the universe have gathered to greet him. This assembly is called qulxwaix, and Nuxmāt-a is termed Nuxqulxwaixa[1] for its duration. While waiting, the guests perform kuxiut dances, similar to those carried out by members of the kuxiut society on earth (see vol. II, chap. 1). At Alqantām's entry the heat becomes so intense that the occupants rush forth precipitately, some falling and being trampled upon in the crush. Only three[2] advisers, including Saxsxālaix (I, p. 41), remain to confer with him. They arrange the fate of human beings during the coming year; who shall be made a kuxiut, who shall be born, who shall die. In each case the decision rests with Alqantām, though he is influenced by his counsellors. Human beings can often learn in dreams what is being decided for them.

Alqantām, in spite of his strength, shares the limitations of any other chief, and is not invariably successful. The Bella Coola delight in telling stories of how supernatural beings, especially the Raven, outwitted and defeated him. Even human beings, in the beginning of time when they were semi-supernatural, sometimes prevailed against him. One story actually records his murder. From the point of view of morality, an angle from which the Bella Coola themselves do not regard him, Alquntăm is neither moral nor immoral; he has the virtues and vices of a man. That, in fact, is a fair summing up of Alquntăm; he is a superman, creator of life, supreme god in the sense that he is chief of the supernatural beings, but not an all-powerful deity. 776 [538]

Compared with Alquntăm, other supernatural beings are insignificant. The Bella Coola do not regard them as a hierarchy with definitely graded rank and power; accordingly, the order in which they are described is immaterial. Reference has already been made to the supernatural Carpenters.[9] There are four of them, created by Alquntăm in the beginning of time; it was they who constructed the mountains and rivers of this land, the animals and birds populating them, and supervised the making of mankind. They are considered to be four brothers, collectively known as Masmasălănx.

The eldest and most powerful is Yulătimut, "He Who Completes Any Task with a Single Smoothing Motion."

The second brother is Mătlăhălitcak, "He Who Completes Any Task with a Single Stroke of an Adze."

The third brother is Măliăpexwak, "He Who Completes Any Task with Two Strokes of His Adze."

The fourth and youngest brother is shthulăk, "He Who Completes Any Task in a Single Day."

In Kimsquit, Mătlăhălitcak is often called Masmasălănx and the collective term is not used. These names explain the beliefs of the Bella Coola with regard to the powers of the Carpenters. After their work in the beginning of time, the three younger brothers returned to Nusmăt·a, where they have since resided, but Yulătimut came to earth and married a Bella Bella woman. The Bella Coola admit that members of this [186] [648]

[776] tribe are superior to themselves in carpentry, and ascribe their [116] skill to the fact that many of them are descendants of Yaiâ-
[648] ûmat. Some of the coastal tribes are said to believe that Alquntûm erred in the manufacture of many of the sea mammals, giving them, for example, human heads on fish bodies; he later rectified this by sending his Carpenters to adjust their form. This is not a Bella Coola belief. One elderly man stated that the skill of the Carpenters in painting and modelling was derived from a little girl named Spothemer; no confirmation could be obtained for this statement and the information was vague and unreliable.

Since their creation of the sky and many features of this world, as well as birds and animals, the Carpenters have entered but little into the lives of the Bella Coola. Like other supernatural beings, they are capable of going anywhere, but for many generations they have not been seen on this earth.
[575] Their most important function, perhaps, is to act as patrons for various hamat dancers. This subject will be described in detail in vol. II, chap. 1; for the moment it is enough to say that many supernatural beings regard members of this semi-sacred society as their protégés, and grant them power to per-[535] form dances. On these occasions masked figures are used to represent the patrons, thus enlightening uninitiated persons as to the appearance and attributes of various supernatural beings.

Among the many residents of Nusmât-a are two sons of Alquntûm, Sûnoliqumûlâ Alquntûm and Sno'elnâ Alquntûm. The former in particular is dearly loved by his father and is often spoken of as Nusiswanurûtum, "The Cherished One."
[575] These two beings take no part in the affairs of mortals except as patrons of hamat dancers. Like all supernatural beings they are considered to be immortal. Since Alquntûm has two sons it is to be assumed that he has, or had, a wife. Her name is not generally known, although she is sometimes spoken of as [538] Nusmât-aim-a, "The Woman of Nusmât-a." There are also many stories describing his amours with human women resulting in semi-supernatural offspring.

Raven, perhaps made conceited by this power, did not always use it for good purposes. He knew many new inventions which he taught to the Bella Coola, but sometimes he indulged in adventures of an obscene nature. In fact, he was often too "smart." The Bella Coola relate many tales concerning his exploits. These are all more stories, such as can be told by anyone, and they fall into two classes. One comprises humorous anecdotes, describing how Raven tried to show off, to outwit other birds and animals, and his consequent discomfiture. These belong to the realm of mythology and are recorded in vol. II, chap. v. In addition, there are stories describing the inventions and boons obtained by Raven; these are given in detail here as the only satisfactory means of illustrating the attitude of the Bella Coola towards Raven.

The first Raven, to whom Alquntám granted such power, is not regarded as a bird, but essentially as a superman, with the kindly characteristics of a human being, and the weakness of a conceited individual who is always trying to display his prowess. The ordinary word used for a raven is qnem, but this first Raven is properly referred to by his titles as chief, Nemskilc; Sémenimkuts, "The Light-Bringer"; Kilakumsnus, "The Wise One"; Ne'ermaitkemsis, "The Widower";* Kemqumsnu ulkilit qnem, "The Unknower of Light";* Kse ómsnile, Kseni-lit, and Ksení. The Bella Coola do not explain what happened to this first Nemskilc; he appears to have dropped out of existence, and his power has not been transmitted to his descendants, the ravens of today. They are regarded as birds, with but the slightest trace of their ancestor's greatness. The Bella Coola know of the beliefs of the Kitkatla concerning Raven, and say that in the north he is esteemed only a little less than the supreme deity himself. But in Bella Coola the exploits of Raven are always considered to be due to the power given him by Alquntám, whose assistant he was, although he delighted to show his own prowess by outwitting his maker.

provided with means of sustenance, a house, and certain supernatural powers. The right to the names of these people, as well as to the type of ceremonial objects used by them, has been the privilege of their descendants. But these early Bella Coola, like their modern descendants, had several designations, each carrying with it a definite prerogative. In a single myth there may be embodied a dance or more names and incidents which are quoted at the present day to authorize such different phases of culture as dances, rights to hunting-grounds, professions, names of dogs, or totem prerogatives.* Any myth which gives the initial use of a name, a dance, or any other prerogative, is termed a snaxnim. Each of these is, or was in the old days, remembered with great care and never recounted in full detail except to the members of the ancestral family whose names are embodied in it. Even at potlatches the full details of the myth are not told here. Indeed, if a young man is of a flighty, garrulous disposition, unlikely to preserve the dignity of his ancestral fame, the details are concealed from him. Even at the present time there is much resentment at any unauthorized use of a snaxnim, and in the old days this would inevitably have led to bloodshed.

Boas (p. 116) states that the terms snaxnim and sacoma are synonymous. The writer feels certain that this is an error. It was discussed repeatedly with various Bella Coola, all of whom agreed that a sacoma is a mere story which can be told by anyone, whereas a snaxnim is a myth possessed by the individual, or individuals, whose prerogatives are derived from it. To the Bella Coola the two are utterly different.

None the less, there is no doubt that records of the past change from one category to the other. A wealthy chief, eager to give a potlatch, but lacking the mythical authorization, must frequently have used a sacoma, claiming the hero as an ancestor. There would be veiled amusement at him for doing so, but the prestige of one who can give potlatches is so great that in time his claim would probably be accepted. The two

*The details of these will be described later.

539 brothers have the right, moreover, to hunt and collect food in the places used by these first ancestors. The areas so authorized are:

Hemulqimuc: the mountain where they first came to earth.

Ckgomip: a valley leading into the main valley of the Kimsquit River where Ckgomkilida was accustomed to hunt.

Nakpi kit: a valley where Smanu's wives used to pick berries.

Ipmuck: a level tract of country on the bank of the Kimsquit River twenty-eight miles from its mouth. Its people landed here and Smanu pre-emptied it as a hunting ground.

Nalpu kut: another valley where Smanu's wives used to pick berries.

The place in the Kimsquit River where their salmon-weir was erected, and the spot where they caught eulachon.

The length and wealth of detail embodied in this myth raises the question of whether it is one of the usual type, or represents a combination of several stories strung together and related by a man eager to glorify the traditions of his own ancestors. It was received from Jim Pollard, a Kimsquit Indian, descended from Smanu, and himself the user of this name, a valuable and reliable informant. Jim is a man of great ability, who has given more potlatches than any other Indian of either Bella Coola or Kimsquit, and who, accordingly, has been able to validate very fully his ancestral myths and the names embodied therein. Owing to the deaths of his relatives, Jim has been able to use designations and portions of this legend which otherwise would certainly have belonged to other people. In this respect it, therefore, represents an amalgamation, but one of a legitimate nature. Theoretically, every myth would be complete if it were not for the parts possessed by others, and the aim of every wise Bella Coola is to seek the return of these pieces by judicious marriage. Jim has been able to achieve this by the death of his relatives and the assistance of his wife, herself a descendant of Smanu. Before the coming of the white man and the consequent dwindling of population, it is unlikely that any one person would have the duly validated right to tell a myth of this length, but theoretically it was possible, and might have been done by anyone as superior to his fellows as this man is to the present inhabitants of Kimsquit.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nawulst[20]

539 Among the first people dispatched to this earth were four brothers, Hamet, Wakis, Alkwa, and Alkaitlis, who came as eagles and settled in Nawulst, the site of the present Manicou Cannery, Kimsquit. Before [illegible] aided by other sticks which beat time of their own accord. From this night [illegible] became a shaman and used what he had seen when he was giving a dance of his own. His brother [illegible] were downstream until he came to a large house at [illegible] outside of which stood a huge bull-head. No one was in this house and [illegible] took possession of it.

A TRANSCENDENT CROSS MYTH[illegible]

Long ago at the time the world was first populated there were no rivers anywhere, for such were confined underground in a cavern-like prison called [illegible], the approach to which was barred by a huge boulder. Not only were the rivers shut up, but with them were their occupants, including the salmon. First Eagle tried to break this barrier, but without avail; then Raven succeeded. Since then the Bella Coola River has flowed in its present course. But the Turner River was still in bondage, to the disgust of the chiefs who wished to travel up it to the home of the chief, [illegible]. The Carpenter, [illegible], took pity on them and by breaking the barrier permitted them to reach their destination.

Origin Myths of Other Tribes

177 As has been repeatedly stated, the Bella Coola have ob-538 tained many prerogatives by marriages with the members of [424] neighbouring tribes. Among these are, according to their belief, myths dealing with the peopling of distant localities. Ceremonially and sociologically, such traditions have the same importance as myths that describe Bella Coola as the final place of settlement of the first inhabitants. Accordingly, they can be given at this point.

177 In the previous section the original landing-places of some 538 of the individuals described is said to have been outside the
174 Bella Coola valley. Boas, discussing this fact (p. 122), sug-114 gests that such myths may reflect the movements of the ancestors of the Bella Coola from the parent Salish stock. Though this is a plausible hypothesis, it is also possible that a foreign myth, obtained by marriage, might have been altered in the course of generations to the Bella Coola pattern, preserving as the only foreign element that of settlement at a distance at the beginning of time.

OREGON NOTES OF Owikh[illegible]

In the beginning of time Ayaxnim decreed that four brothers should be sent down to this earth. The eldest, whose name was Hhaitlis, came down from a hole in Nuxmit'a and told his younger brothers to wait while he went ahead to reconnoiter. He took the form of a wolf and, as soon as he had reached the earth, went far to the east, where he obtained some abalone shells. Then he returned to Ayaxnim's house, left his spoil with his brothers, and again went off alone to the west. This time he brought back some copper. After this he was ready to settle, so the four assumed the form of eulens and went down to Calvert Island, Owikh, as the Bella Bella call it. There they assumed human form and their wolf shells floated back aloft.

Ayaxnim did not give them food to carry with them, but he told them they would find sea-lions waiting to be killed on Sea-lion Island. Accordingly they hunted on that island, as their descendants, the people of Owikh, have done to this day.

Ayaxnim had given Hhaitlis a box containing some of the cone-shaped whistles used in xaxak dances. The three older brothers decided that they alone should perform the xaxak ceremonial and that, accordingly, the youngest should be kept in ignorance of the contents of the box, as uninitiated people are at the present time. He was a mere boy and his older brothers used to leave him at home when they went hunting, but they had given him the most explicit instructions not to open the carefully sealed box, containing their treasures.

All went well for some time, but finally the boy yielded to temptation and opened the box. His brothers returned unexpectedly, and found him examining the whistles, with his head almost out of sight within. They decided to kill him at once. They crawled up, closed the cover on his head, and sat on the box until life was extinct. Then they laid the body on the ground before them as they sat behind the fire, and sent one of their number out to gather three small pinnat sticks. When this was done they covered the corpse with angle down and sat on the ground around it, raising and lowering the sticks as if they were throwing objects into the [illegible] enough to have many kinsmen. Primarily, responsibility rests with the parents for the care and support of their offspring, but they have the advice, assistance, and material aid of their relatives. Nor are these limited to the near kindred of either father or mother; all members of the ancestral family take their part. Housemates, also, even if unrelated, take an interest in any child who shows their habitation, irrespective of his rank.

Much of the care bestowed on children is of a magical nature and must be reserved until a later chapter. Little boys [illegible] follow their fathers on hunting expeditions and so acquire knowledge by practical experience, as do girls from their mothers with regard to household tasks and feminine occupations.
[illegible] Even small children are quick to notice the attention paid to the orders of chiefs, and carry out their commands without demur. A disobedient child is beaten or thrown into cold [illegible] water; the parents usually act in such cases, though a near relative does not hesitate to do so, especially if he is a chief.
[illegible] Like all other children, Bella Coola boys and girls are fond of stories and listen eagerly to the tales told in the long evenings
[illegible] by some old man or woman. Many of these are somewhat [illegible] obscene, but they serve to teach much ancient lore, and at the same time to emphasize many taboos and restrictions which are thus assimilated without definite schooling. They illustrate the laws of morality, as does the public disapproval shown [illegible] to anyone who infringes some point of etiquette or behaviour.
[illegible] If a child makes fun of a cat-fish or a bull-head, he is not told to stop doing so; instead, one of his elders tells him how, in the distant past, there was a famine, and advises him not to scoff at the fish which alone saved his ancestors from starvation at that time. If a rude little boy laughs at a maimed or deformed [illegible] man, he is told of Hiáiáli, a Bella Bella urchin who repeatedly mocked a one-eyed man and presently, himself, lost the sight of an eye.

"Don't laugh at cripples, blind people, or those who are

These marks serve to indicate the position of the girl, who is both feared and respected, possessed of supernatural power, and yet beneficial. Many Bella Coola stories describe how adolescent girls have been able to vanquish supernatural beings; perhaps the most striking of these is the manner in which they were saved [illegible] when the sun came too close to the earth. At the end of a year, or eleven months according to one old woman, the seclusion is terminated, and the girl resumes her normal activities. The first time she goes to the river she must throw on the water four pieces of dried, and four pieces of undyed cedar-bark. This is especially important if the salmon are running at the time, although no explanation of this ritual is given.

The resumption of her freedom indicates that a girl has reached marriageable age. Chiefs sometimes confine their daughters for even longer than a year, and usually delay their marriages for several years to demonstrate their importance; but this is not necessary, nor is it practised by other than wealthy individuals. It is not uncommon for a girl to wed before her year is out; in that case her restrictions automatically lapse. Chiefs never allow such a curtailment for their daughters; to do so would diminish the prestige of the latter, and be detrimental to the status of their children when they marry and have families. Illicit intercourse with a secluded adolescent is considered not only illegal but disgusting as well. Between the period of confinement and marriage, intercourse is prohibited and guarded against by the parents of a girl, but is not considered filthy and seems to have been fairly common in former times with the daughters of poor people and slaves. This sometimes took place before the first menstruation in spite of the disapproval with which this was regarded.

Although the menstrual blood which appears at the first discharge is considered more baneful than that emitted on later occasions, it is always regarded as uncanny or unclean. It is to a ghost, he informs a dancer of the fact and the latter notifies the relatives of the deceased. If no shaman is convenient, the sheds does endeavors to help himself. Invisible, and armed with a barbed hook, he approaches a person who is eating and pulls away a crumb which falls to the earth. Should the eater stoop to pick things, the ghost, rubbed of his heavy, hurts the offender with his hook, causing toothache or sometimes a sharp pain in the head or stomach. Other ailments are caused by the ghosts hitting with invisible stones those who have offended them. Consequently, no one picks up a crumb which has fallen, since it is impossible to know whether it has been an accident or a mirror. Another indication of a ghost's hunger is loss of a tooth. The loser should throw it on a fire with an invitation to the dead to accept his offering.

The barrier between ghosts and human beings is considered to be little more than a wall of smoke, just too dense for ordinary eyes to penetrate. In early times intercommunication between the denizens of the two worlds was so easy that a dancing mother was once allowed to tend her dead child on earth. Unfortunately, the woman's mother one day insisted on holding her grandchild, unaware that he was a ghost. Shocked at his appearance, the old woman dropped the child, much to the anger of the dead people.* Ever since that time it has been impossible for human beings to see and talk with their deceased kinsmen. Like so many Bella Coola stories, it is doubtful whether this one is regarded as more than an item of ancient history; it is considered to be a fact, but it is not one that enters into the daily thoughts of the people.

Ghosts frequently come to their old homes at night where dogs can see them. If one of these animals begins to bark and gazes fixedly at a spot where nothing is to be seen, it is because a wraith is standing there and the dog's owner hopes that it will remain invisible. It is true that some individuals have received shamanistic power from a ghost, but more often a visitation is disastrous and to be avoided. A dead person often

RELATIONS WITH THE SUPERNATURAL

Introductory—Devils Apparitions—Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate—Supernatural Good Luck—Shamanism—Direct Revelations from the Supreme God—Power Localized in Certain Spots—Dreams

Introductory

THE aspects of Bella Coola life thus far described have been principally of a nature which might be experienced by any member of the community. On the other hand, contact with supernatural beings is a privilege granted to individuals without respect to rank; even arduous appeal cannot assure it. The few to whom signal favours are granted acquire a position of importance totally different from that of chiefs. The Bella Coola are firmly convinced that supernatural beings abound in the mountains and forests of British Columbia, and that every activity of human life is governed by them. Not only do these creatures include monsters of the imagination, but birds, animals, and fish; even the activities of the human mind are considered to be beyond the scope of normal life. Ancient stories describing the actions of strange creatures and conversations between man and animals are accepted as truthful accounts, so that it seems obvious to the Bella Coola that his ancestors were more powerful than he is today. Never considering the possibility of errors in his stories, he accepts the alternative hypothesis that mankind has sadly degenerated from the golden age. Nevertheless, he assumes that the beings have not altered, and consequently hopes to encounter them on every occasion. Moreover, this firm background of belief makes it easy for him to recognize supernatural influence in events which a white man would consider to be natural. It is impossible to over-emphasize this concept.

occupants of the canoe, heard a roaring noise and saw a fish-weir, similar to those used by the Bella Coola, stretching across Burke Channel, which is about a mile and a half wide at this point. They went close to the beach and a brave man cut a passage through the obstacle. A similar trap was once seen stretching across South Bentinck Arm. 787 * 538

An unusual apparition may be regarded as an omen of death. For example, not many years ago a young half-breed saw a motor-boat moored to the bank of North Bentinck Arm with an eagle seated in the stern. He ran his own motor-boat towards it, but as he approached the eagle became a man. Then as he drew still nearer, never taking his eyes off the other boat, it, with its occupant, sank beneath the water, without leaving so much as a ripple. On relating the incident to his father, the latter recognized it as an omen of death. Six months later the half-breed's sister died, thus confirming her father's prognostication. 787 * 768 [811]

Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate

Experiences such as have been cited in the last section are regarded as of possible, and not infrequent occurrence at the present time. On the other hand, supernatural aid granted to those in misfortune, though it is the theme of many stories, is not considered as likely to happen now. The Bella Coola believe the narratives to be chronicles of actual events, and base their conceptions of many supernatural beings on their characteristics as therein described. There is no ceremonial significance attached to any of these stories; they may be, and are told by anyone, frequently for entertainment. Unquestionably, there is a feeling that the moral brought out in such tales is of value in educating the young people, though this point is never emphasized. 787 * 538 [869]

Supernatural aid granted to an unfortunate person is termed utsk'waladjut. Power so obtained cannot be transmitted by the recipient, although memory of the experience is 787 * [575] [535] your object was desired, and then set in a window of his house so that the sun could fall on one uncovered end. The owner firmly believes that this stone has brought him money on various occasions, and will do so again, though whether he expects the coins to be found inside of the wrapping, or merely to come to him in the course of trade is questionable. According to Bella Coola belief, they ought to appear beside the stone, but as this man attributes any good fortune to it, he never has any difficulty in proving its powers.

This stone is also used as a means of increasing the efficacy of prayer. When its owner washes ceremonially in the river before eating in the morning, he rubs it over his body as if it were soap and requests it to make him strong, make him well, grant him his desires, and so forth.

Shamanism

More important to the Bella Coola than any other manifestation of the supernatural is that power which makes an individual either an ilakmala or an ilakmalots. The former is a person who, owing to ability granted him by a supernatural being, is able to perform miraculous feats, especially in curing the sick; the latter is one with similar powers obtained from a ghost.[4] It is impossible to translate either of these terms accurately; the designation "shaman" is accordingly used in this monograph to describe both types of supernaturally endowed individuals. The most common and most important method of obtaining such power is from a living supernatural being; a person receiving the boon in this manner will be termed "shaman," and one empowered by a ghost will be known as "shaman from the dead."

The Bella Coola believe that long ago men were so much more powerful than at present, and so close to the supernatural, that all were virtually shamans. The prowess and adventures of these demi-gods of antiquity are favourite themes for stories. The powers of the later shamans have been far less than those of their forebears, and their exploits have been of a somewhat different character. Hence it is possible to divide the subject into three sections:

(a) Shamanism in the distant past.
(b) Modern shamanism.
(c) Shamans from the dead.

SHAMANISM IN THE DISTANT PAST

Information on this phase is contained in stories and a few anecdotes which describe the achievements of ancient demi-gods, endowed with miraculous powers of various kinds. The tales are similar in type to those dealing with the granting of supernatural aid to the unfortunate, so that it is in many cases difficult to differentiate them. As might be expected these narratives are not exact. Frequently the teller does not know from what being the ancient shaman received his power, nor can he explain the abilities described, which are different from, and superior to, those with which he is familiar. In fact it is customary to describe any mythical hero as a shaman.

Tales of this kind can be related by any one; they are not the personal property of a specific family. Many of them, that of W'awal ci, for example, are well known and are told and retold constantly.

In addition to information obtained from stories, a few isolated facts are remembered regarding ancient shamans. It is thought that various taboos connected with hunting were learnt by them in the distant past. Such restrictions and injunctions were firmly believed in and strictly adhered to until a few years ago, and many of them are still observed. The usual method of hunting harlequin ducks is, or was until recently, from a canoe, with a sapling set up in the bow to hide the hunter, crouched with bow and arrow in readiness; several shamans, however, were able to kill the birds by merely waving the butt-end of a paddle towards them. Such power

KNOWLEDGE of the contact between supernatural and human beings is based largely upon tales describing such incidents; in fact, generalizations like those made in the last chapter are, as has been already stated, contrary to Haida Creole practice. Such tales are, however, so numerous and so long that their inclusion in the sections describing the kind of experiences they illustrate would have made the last chapter unduly cumbersome and confusing. Stories recounting these types of contact with the supernatural are brought together here, not as items of folk-lore, but as basic material to supplement the relevant sections of the last chapter. These legends are not family property, but are considered to be historical incidents which can be related by anyone.

STORIES ILLUSTRATING SUPERNATURAL AID GRANTED TO THE UNFORTUNATE

THE GAMBLER'S SUCCESS

Four brothers, of whom the youngest was named Djuadju-ts, were very fond of gambling with crabapple sticks. They played on all occasions, but with such luck of success that they lost first their goods, then their houses, their mother, their children, their wives, and finally themselves. The three older men went hunting every day, but Djuadju-ts remained in the house as if he had no heart to do more than lie down and die. Perhaps he had an inspiration; at any rate he was deceiving his brothers, because as soon as they had gone out he used to get up and collect clams which were plentiful below the floor of the house. These were his sole sustenance, but he also chewed the fin of an old salmon, which served to exercise his jaws. Before his brothers' return Djuadju-ts always lay down in his corner, covered with an old dirty blanket, as if he small hole in his skin blanket and once more lay down as if to sleep, but fixed his eye on the opening. Soon there drew near a beautiful woman with long hair.

"Don't vanish," Kaldcap said to her. "I see you."

The woman, not at all perturbed at being seen, merely answered:

"Come to my house."

Kaldcap followed his visitor, a mouse in human form, down under the earth to her home, a cave on the very edge of the precipice. One side of the house opened out into the canyon without a wall of any kind. Here the mouse-woman's three beautiful sisters were waiting.

"Let us play," said the mice. "Won't you swing us?"

[524] From the roof was suspended a swing consisting of two long ropes with a small cross-seat at the bottom, and a long rope by which it could be hauled back and forth, exactly like the swings formerly used by Bella Coola boys. One of the sisters took her place on the seat and Kaldcap pulled her back and forth so that she swung far out into the canyon. Then another took her place, followed by the third and the fourth, until he had swung them all. Next they suggested that he take his turn. A second rope was attached to the seat, Kaldcap took his place, and the four women, two on each side, pulled so strongly that he, in turn, swung far out into the canyon. Then the treacherous mice jerked the ropes violently, throwing him from the seat down into the depths.

Even as he was falling Kaldcap retained sufficient presence of mind to thrust out his bow, in which his supernatural power was localized, and to which he had clung. It lodged in a cranny of the canyon wall, arresting his fall, and he, being small and light, succeeded in gaining a foothold on a rough path. He crawled up it to the surface of the gorge at some little distance from the place where he had camped, but on the same side of the gorge. Full of anger, he made his way back to the house of the mice.

"Let's play some more," he said to them.

But the mice, amazed at seeing him alive, were afraid to trust themselves to his swinging, even though he promised that they should later have an opportunity of doing the same to him.

"No," they said. "Sometime we will allow you to return and play with us, and you can sleep with us if you like. You had better go home now."

Kaldcap returned to his camp. When, the next day, he told his sister of his adventure she was terrified, and once more besought him to avoid all dangers.[11]

[538] [11]Though in this case the hero outwitted scheming women, it is said that in many ancient stories the reverse was true.

754 would probably fall a victim. He became ill in May, 1923, 761 and, though treated by a white doctor, grew steadily worse 789 until he died in the latter part of June, three weeks after the 828 year had elapsed. All the Bella Coola firmly believe that this [622] was due to the power of thought. The father of the woman was a powerful chief whose thoughts were accordingly potent, and some consider that his concentrated desires and expectations were enough to kill the accused, while others believe that his expressed statements convinced others of the result, and that it was their combined thought that caused the death. It usually requires the thoughts of more than one individual to lead to this effect. The doctor who attended this man stated that his patient had shown symptoms of melancholy and resignation during his last sickness; it seems clear that the expectation of death must have lessened his chance of recovery.

771 A prominent theme in Bella Coola folk-lore is the belief 954 that a person cannot long survive who has made himself un-828 popular. It is sometimes stated that a magical means was [538] employed to remove him, and this was no doubt often the case; a person who learns that a "medicine" had been employed to kill him is in no fit mental condition to counteract the power of suggestion, particularly if he knows that others are aware of what has been done. His death is regarded as proof of the efficacy of the means employed and the belief of others grows stronger. As already stated, this conviction still survives. When this ethnological investigation was being conducted, a [648] point under discussion was whether or not the Kimsquit people should be allowed to live in Bella Coola. One chief took the lead in objecting and everyone expected that, having thus roused the ire of would-be immigrants, he would die. He did so soon afterwards, and it is universally believed that it was caused by the concentration of the hostile thoughts of the Kimsquit. Similarly, the potency of taboos is increased by the fact that since [784] time immemorial the thoughts of everyone have been opposed to any infraction. Consequently, an offender is liable to punishment both for breaking an injunction and because he

*575 in a flesh-coloured bathing-suit, imitating the nakedness of *796 earlier years. The writer was talking to one of the marshals, 178 a very old man, and remarked how different the present rites must appear to him.

"Yes," replied the old man. "But after all, the change is not so great. In former years we imitated what the supernatural beings did, now we imitate what our fathers did."

Many ethnologists, acquainted with the elaborate rituals carried out on the coast early in this century, have expressed surprise at the rapidity with which these have dwindled to mere shadows. The writer believes that one factor for the Bella Coola decline in ritual, is the realization that the rites are imitative, and that accordingly their significance need not be lost when further imitation is added.

*575 Further research would undoubtedly have added particu-
*796 lars of the manner in which other Cannibals carried out their rites, but to obtain the full details of all would have been detrimental to other types of investigation; it is believed that the above descriptions are typical. Before passing to other dances, a few general remarks on the Cannibal ritual may prove useful.

*575 In view of the arduous character of the dance, and the *796 necessity for impressing the uninitiated with the great power 424 of the Cannibals, the marshals usually prohibit a man from [562] acting unless he is physically strong. Rarely, however, a woman is allowed to be a Cannibal if she has the necessary prerogative, but usually only if she is the last survivor of her family. In such cases the shorter rite is the more common.

[538] As before stated, kusiut origin myths are supposed to be [173] remembered, but in practice few kukusiut know the history of their prerogatives. The process of forgetting has undoubtedly increased in the last few years, but the writer feels confident that they were never maintained with the same care as origin myths connected with the first people.

CHAPTER IV

GAMES

517 THE subject of games, lying on the border-line of social 121 customs, was one which was not fully investigated. The [177] Bella Coola, like all other peoples, have a number of sports and pastimes and although the old diversions are being forgotten by the younger people, many of the old men and women are familiar with those played in their youth. As isolated customs these may be of small value, but games of all kinds often preserve ancient practices and, as providing useful clues to the spread of peoples or of culture, are worthy of investigation. Unfortunately, lack of time made it impossible to give the subject the attention it deserved, and the few games here described must not be considered an exhaustive treatment of the subject.

526 Though less fond of competitive sports than the Indians
[171] of the Plains, the Bella Coola enjoy canoe-racing and wrestling.
[628] The former appears to have been an ancient diversion; picked crews from different villages competed amid the encouraging shouts of their fellows, and even now the younger men are anxious to display their skill in this respect. Wrestling, which [177] used to be common during all non-sacred gatherings, has almost entirely disappeared since the prohibition of the potlatch.

● 538 The favourite sedentary pastime, enjoyed equally by young [517] and old, is the telling of stories. Those of a sacred nature, especially ancestral myths, are reserved of course for ceremonial occasions, but the older men and women remember [125] many tales describing the exploits of birds and animals which are retounted again and again to the enjoyment of the listeners, although they may have heard the same recital fifty times. Children enjoy the companionship of some old story-teller and it is a common sight to see an old man or woman, surrounded by an eager group, explaining once more how Raven outwitted his rivals or was himself led into difficulties. Many of these [167] stories are somewhat indecent; others appear brutally frank,

2:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

but the Bella Coola do not consider this aspect and the children grow up in an atmosphere entirely lacking in restraint of speech. Some stories teach a moral lesson, but they are recounted merely for entertainment. At the present time, no one knows who invented the stories; they have been handed down from dim antiquity and alterations or embellishments are considered improper, while the composition of new tales appears to be unknown.

Another pastime is smoking. Among some Indian tribes the practice has a definite religious significance, but this appears to be lacking among the Bella Coola. Most of the men enjoy either a pipe or cigarettes, and some of the women also indulge, but few carry the habit to excess. All the older people affirmed that their ancestors had smoked for generations. Tobacco was not grown, but kinnikinick, mlie', was used, and also a plant known as lsaie'. Another smoking mixture was bark of lsowaidp, toasted before a fire until dried and brown, and then crumbled between the hands. These materials have given place entirely to imported tobacco, and the white man's pipe has replaced the native one. The latter consisted of a gooseberry cane from which the pith had been extracted; sometimes a small bowl of elderberry wood was added, but often the mixture to be smoked was simply placed within the end of the hollow stem.

Adults, especially the men, are addicted to gambling. They are fond of placing stakes on a race or other trial of strength, and enjoy all kinds of games of chance. Some of the younger men have mastered a few of the simpler games of cards on which they spend a certain amount of time and money. The favourite gambling game, however, is one found in all parts of the coast, which is played with a pack of fifty-four smoothed crabapple sticks. The rules are complicated and no effort was made to learn more than the general principles. The pieces are divided among the eight or ten contestants and concealed; then one player guesses in whose hand a certain marked stick is hidden. If he is successful, the others pay him a forfeit; if

STORIES

Raven Stories—Animal Stories—Young Stories—Supernatural Stories—Catastrophic Stories — Historical Stories

IN addition to myths which have definite sociological importance, such as those which explain the procedure of dances and other rituals, there are many legends which can best be described as stories.[1] These do not belong either to individuals or to families, consequently they are more widely known than allegedly historical accounts which are the personal property of social groups. In the long winter evenings it is common to see an old man or woman surrounded by young boys and girls listening attentively to some tale. An outburst of laughter always accompanies a humorous incident, no matter how many times it may have been heard. The narration is a mere pastime, an amusement which seems never to pall either on recounter or listener. Occasionally, a person of philosophical disposition will claim that a moral is taught by every story, and it is true that many of them point out some well-known experience of life, such as "The Biter Bit"; this must unconsciously strike the hearers, but any intentional didacticism is quite foreign to Bella Coola thought.

As will be seen, these stories contain a large number of fantastic episodes. The Bella Coola recognize this to be the case without doubting their truth. They describe events which took place long, long ago, when man and supernatural beings were in closer contact than at present; when man was able to understand the speech and actions of the birds, the mammals, and the fish. The people of today do not expect to have similar experiences now but, according to their point of view, there is no reason why the incidents of the stories could not have happened in the distant past. Frequently, different versions of the same legend are told by different men; each is [1] Sisnaxa, a story or, more accurately, a piece of ancient lore.

538 certain that his account is the only accurate one, and ridicules his rival, but as no social importance is attached to the tales, an error in narration is a matter of small moment. Probably there have been instances in which an individual possessing [558] much wealth has transformed a story into a family myth, but it was impossible to obtain a concrete illustration of this; it is thought that this may have been done in former years, though of course such would be absolutely contrary to custom.

Stories can be conveniently divided into two types:

[825] I. Those in which the principal character is a mammal or bird endowed with human intelligence.

II. Those in which the principal character is a human being.

[825] Many of the first type describe the adventures and mis-[776] adventures of Raven. It must be remembered that the Bella Coola regard these stories as accurate statements of fact, and base their characterizations of many supernatural beings on their actions as recorded therein.

Raven Stories

HOW RAVEN BECAME BLACK

*539

When Raven was fully prepared for his descent to earth, Ăpănăw told Mănăkăilănăl to make him the prettiest of all the birds. When finished, he was adorned with many colours and was very handsome. But the vain Raven looked at himself and was not satisfied. First he asked that one atom might be changed, and when this was done as he desired, he asked for an alteration in one of his legs; and so on with nearly every part of his body. Finally, Ăpănăw became angry, and told some of his assistants to throw ashes all over him. This made Raven a uniform black, in which guise he was sent down to earth.

RAVEN AND WATER OUZEL[7]

As he was able to assume any form, Raven, once upon a time, took that of a herald and went to the home of Water Ouzel, who, having spread a fine cedar-mat for his guest, proceeded to prepare a meal. He brought him, which, with her supernatural power, she was able to do. She reluctantly granted his request, and Raven became very proud of his splendid locks. 539*

Next year, when Raven caught sockeye salmon he obeyed his wife's instructions by carefully hanging the fish up to dry without removing the heads. One day, however, his long hair became entangled with the teeth of a drying salmon, and in a fit of anger he wrenched off its head, throwing it outside the door. His wife was so vexed and grieved that she cried and cried until her face was swollen and Raven became frightened at her continued lamentation. After he had left the house, Sockeye Salmon told her sisters-in-law to make a fire and put on it all her personal possessions. She said that she intended to leave that night, and that the smoke would animate her husband's salmon, but not those caught by his sisters. When it was dark she carried out her threat. She whistled, and Raven's fish came to life; then she ran to the river, raised the edge of the water as if it had been a blanket and plunged beneath, followed by them. Raven tried in vain to pursue, but lost both his wife and his salmon.

Animal Stories

Raven is more frequently endowed with human characteristics to serve as the central figure in stories than any other bird or mammal, but the following are examples of similar tales centring around other figures. 538 825

MINK AND CAT-FISH[22]

539*

Once upon a time, long, long ago, before men and animals had grown so unlike one another, Mink went to the home of a Cat-Fish woman, who politely invited him to stay for a meal. When he had finished eating he said to his hostess:

"Are you afraid of anything?"

"No," she replied.

"Are you not afraid of Grizzly Bear?"

"No," answered the woman again.

Mink repeated his question with regard to Wolf, Black Bear, Wolverine, Cougar, and all the other fierce animals, but Cat-Fish assured him that she feared none of them. At length he asked:

"Are you afraid of Owl?"[23]

[22]There are no true cat-fish in Bella Coola; the species so designated is probably one of the sculpins. [136]

[23]No mean the western horned owl.

and cold to destroy the reckless creatures who had dared to oppose him. While he was climbing down, the attackers called out, attracting his attention, so that Halibut was able to wriggle, unobserved, to a place at the bottom of the ladder. As Cold Wind trod upon him, Halibut moved, and his antagonist fell to the ground. He was seized by his enemies before he could rise to release more cold. 539* 821

"What have you against me?" he asked them. "I visit you only twelve months in the year."

"That is too often," his captors replied, as they stretched him out on the ground to kill him.

"If you spare me I will visit you for nine months only," Cold Wind made offer.

Again he was told that was too much, and he must be killed. Cold Wind, terrified, proposed coming for shorter and shorter periods, six months, four months, two months, and finally for a single month, but each offer was refused, and followed by threats of instant death. At length the captors accepted his agreement to come only in the early morning.

That is why, to this day, the cold wind comes only in the early morning.

Sminq Stories

538 776

Of the supernatural animals which the Bella Coola believe inhabit the wild glens and mountains of British Columbia, that which figures most prominently in their mythology is the sminq. There are four slightly different varieties of this monster. The most common is regarded as being about the size of a large grizzly bear, but with long front legs and short hind ones, on which it can run in upright position when it so desires. Its legs terminate in large talons resembling those of an eagle, with the thumb set opposite to the fingers; its pelt, long and fleecy, is of a grayish-blue colour. The monster is able to roll its eye-balls completely over, and, when the reverse side is exposed, there shoot forth dazzling beams of light which strike senseless anyone on whom they fall. It uses its eyes for hunting. The most peculiar feature of the sminq, however, is that it carries on its back a basket provided with spikes inclined inwards and downwards at such an angle that any living creature thrust within is unable to escape. The basket 538 776 can be removed at will, and the Bella Coola relate how, long ago, the inhabitants of a village captured one of these. Cruelly, they placed it at the top of a lofty tree, then carefully smoothed off the bark to make climbing virtually impossible. The unfortunate smmq tried repeatedly to scale the tree, amid the mockings of its human tormentors; at last it succeeded in doing so, whereupon it dashed off, happily, with its basket.

Less dangerous than the smmq is the creature known as po qwais, differing only from the true smmq in having a band of white through its eyes. A third variety, smmqos wa sumdäs, the mountain smmq, remains perpetually above the line of vegetation. Little is known of it.

The most dangerous is a true smmq with the genital organs of a woman on its forehead. This creature is able to reverse the course of streams, to cause light snow to fall, and even to raise up mountains when pursued. A hunter meeting one of these monsters is in deadly danger unless he calls it by its name, splix, female genitalia. So doing will cause the animal to lose its power and grovel and writhe impotently on the ground.

Like all other supernatural animals, the smmq is believed to have only recently quitted the vicinity of Bella Coola, on account, so it is said, of the noise made by the rifles of the white man. No living Bella Coola claims to have seen one of the animals, though several state that they have heard them not many years ago. It is assumed that the smmq has migrated to some less populated area, probably to the region north of Dean Channel and east of Frederick Island.

The following stories, which are among the most popular in Bella Coola, illustrate the characteristics of the smmq.

#539

THE GRAVE ROBBER[41]

Long, long ago, there was a large Bella Coola town[42] on the White-

*539

It was a long journey home, perhaps twelve miles, but the little girl carefully carried one end of the rope, nor did she forget to tie it to a tree before she entered the house. When she had told of her amazing adventures, great was the delight of her parents at her escape from such a perilous predicament. She told of the old woman rooted to the ground, and gave her name, well-known as that of a woman who had mysteriously disappeared one night many years previously, whose fate had never been discovered. The girl told also of the wealth on the walls of the swaq's house, valuables robbed from the coffins of the dead, and how the old woman had bade her bring her friends to carry away the loot.

Next morning the entire population of the village set out on the quest, led by the little girl, who carefully watched the rope to guide her back to her destination. After travelling about twelve miles they came to the canyon.

"We are almost there," she said. "I can see the opening into the cave."

No one else could distinguish it so the villagers went closer, but still it remained invisible to all except the girl herself. She rubbed her hands over the eyes of about a dozen men and at once they were able to see the mouth of the cave. With these men she entered and found nothing altered since the preceding day. The place was packed to the roof with all sorts of treasure, including a countless number of mountain goat skins, highly prized for their wool. The men took down the valuables and divided them equally among all who had taken part in the expedition. A more difficult task was to free the old woman. First they tried to pull her up, but the roots were as firm as if a part of the mountain itself. At her request, given the day before to the little girl, they had brought an axe and when all else failed they cut her roots. When the last was severed, however, her life went too for it extended down into them. So the party went home without her.

Two other versions of this story were collected; they resemble the accounts here given so closely that publication seems unnecessary.

*538

Supernatural Stories

In this section are grouped a number of miscellaneous accounts, describing the adventures of supernaturally endowed individuals, and of those who came in contact with supernatural beings but received no special boon. These are of

2:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

many kinds, some of which verge on the tales of shamans already given. Like all others in this chapter, the following stories have no social significance and can be related by anyone. 538

THE WRONGED WOMAN

539*

Long, long ago, the sister of Kina'o married a foreign chief with whom she went home to live. Her husband used to beat her and treat her so abominably that she kept asking him to allow her to return; finally he consented, and she set off gladly with him in his canoe. About half-way to the destination, the husband landed and asked his wife to climb with him to the top of a very tall tree. This she did, nor did she become suspicious when he sharpened the extreme tip of the trunk. Suddenly, he seized her, and thrust her down on to the point which pierced into the lower part of her body, pinning her to the tree-top. The evil husband then returned home.

The captive did not die immediately. From the tree-top she could see canoes passing, and kept calling out for help, but no one heard her. At last her brother Kina'o went by, en route to his sister's home with a present of food. Not knowing who he was, she cried out as she had done before; he recognized her voice, landed, but at first could not see her, and was filled with amazement to discover her pinned up the tree. Up he climbed to lift her off, but as he did so, she died.

Kina'o determined to have his revenge. He clothed himself in his sister's cape, hat, and blanket, in order to resemble her; this was an easy matter as the two looked alike. Thus attired, he continued his way to his brother-in-law's village, which he entered, leaning heavily on a stick as if he had received an injury to the lower part of his body. He said nothing, but Sumus, his sister's husband's mother, saw him and mistook him for her daughter-in-law.

"You have been beating your wife again," she said to her son. "Look how she is limping."

He did not answer, being amazed to see her alive.

Kina'o lay down as if sick while Sumus prepared for her a dish of putrid salmon roe and bracken roots. When this was ready, the old woman sent one of her daughters to summon the supposed daughter-in-law who sat down near the fire and ate with bent head. The daughter noticed the great size of the eater's arms and legs and commented upon this to her mother.

"Hush!" answered the latter. "Don't be rude."

When Kina'o had finished eating he went back to bed and then the *539 him how unhappy he was, because people on earth called him a bastard.

821 "Never mind, my son," said Ilqunŭm. "Presently, I will let you do my work and then you will be more powerful than anyone on earth."

Next morning the father sent the lad off to act as sun, giving him the usual supply of heat. But the boy was so angry with the people on earth that he increased this supply, hoping to burn up the whole of them. Seeing some children at play, he swooped down to slay them; it became so hot that water boiled in the lakes and rivers and the whole race of mankind was roasted to death. Most of the animals escaped by hiding in bur-[825] rows, but not the black bear, who at that time had a white coat. It was burnt black and has remained that colour ever since, while the grizzly was scorched to his present rustness. The deer and the weasel failed to hide their tails, both of which were burnt; that is why each has a black tip to this day.

Ilqunŭm, angry at his son for killing everybody, restored all to life, [825] and broke the malicious child into countless pieces which he threw down to earth in the form of mosquitoes.

Catastrophic Stories

*538 Disasters which occurred in the distant past provide themes for stories of a non-ceremonial nature.

THE FAMINE

*539 Ka'lăn-a was a Kimsquit man who made a practice of watching the sun; from its movements he was able to foretell the solstices and other coming events. One winter, long ago, the sun, instead of stopping at its usual place, continued far beyond its proper course. Ka'lăn-a was much worried and prophesied strange changes, with famine; he called on the young men to weep, but instead they merely laughed at him. Next summer, when there was plenty of fish, berries, and other foods, the people jeered at the prophet. For four years there was the same plentiful hunting and collecting, but in the fifth came a great change. It failed to become warm in April; the berries flowered, but the constant cold wind prevented their fruit from ripening. Few fish entered the river, and even they could not be caught because the water remained so clear. The same conditions prevailed for four years until the people were starving; their only food was porcupine and mountain goat, with a few trout caught on hook and line. About this time a Kimsquit man, Tsaixlil, went goat-hunting behind his village, and one night after setting his snares, lay down in a cave. He could not sleep, and presently heard the

Another account of the flood states that while many persons fled to Mount Nusqalst, others took refuge on the summit of the mountain opposite to it, on the north side of the Bella Coola River. The waters continued to rise until this latter peak was on the point of being submerged, when it requested Nusqalst to give it some of itself. Nusqalst complied, and gave to the other the small knob that projects from its summit. This was not inundated.

Kimsquit too was flooded at the same time. The Kimsquit River rose until the people were driven to the slopes of the mountain now known as Sulukst, to the west of the river. Here they were forced to camp for several months, and it is from this event that the river received its name, which means "Many Houses." The Dean River people were driven to Mount Swaky, where, in later years, indications of their sojourn were to be found, such as mooring loops for canoes, hooks for lifting fish-traps, and various utensils. One man tried to remove some of these relics, but they crumbled in his hands as if they had been burnt paper.

According to Bella Coola belief, the flood was not limited to any one locality. As evidence of its occurrence in Fort Rupert the following myth was related by a man who had heard it from his father's father, a Fort Rupert Indian.

One of the latter's ancestors, having dreamt that a flood would cover the earth, prepared a great quantity of gum with which he pitched his house both inside and out. Presently it began to rain, and the deluge continued until the whole land was covered, but this man dwelt secure in his rain-proof house. When at last he heard the sound of drops on the roof, he knew that the flood must have diminished so he dared open his door. When he and his family went outside they found on the shore two susiutl, the supernatural double-headed salmon that cause land-slides. From this event the man took the designation, Nukao·sa. When the present owner of the name performs his ceremonial, the beating-boards are in the shape of a susiutl, and there appears a masked figure of a man who always shields his face with his arm. This appears to be an allusion to the man protecting himself from the waters.[70]

It is said that the time of the great heat[71] occurred soon after the flood.

Although the Bella Coola regard all the stories included in this chapter as chronicles of events, yet they realize that all the preceding possess elements of the supernatural which are [70] It was impossible to learn the type of ceremonial of which this story serves as origin myth; it has accordingly been included in this miscellaneous section.

[71] Various accounts of this have already been given; see vol. II, p. 424 and p. 500.

not likely to occur at the present time; in fact, they belong to the golden age of the distant past. In addition, a few tales are popularly told, not for their wealth of interesting detail, but as historical incidents. Some of these contain exaggerations that verge on mythology, whereas others, especially those dealing with certain individuals not long deceased, have clearly a foundation of truth. The themes include tales of travel, hunting exploits, the experiences of criminals, and varied subjects.

THE WIFE WHO WAS SOLD AS A SLAVE

539*

This story describes the adventures of a Bella Coola woman, daughter of a chief named Tsakxwaim, who was married to a Bella Bella chief. The latter's father sold her as a slave to Tcikisa, a Kitkatla chief and ancestor of the chief with the same name who was so feared by the Bella Coola. This was, of course, contrary to all established custom. Tcikisa carried the woman away to Kitkatla, whence there seemed little hope for her return.

Tcikisa owned a number of crabapple trees at Kitlobe which he visited every autumn to collect and preserve the fruit. The woman had been with him for some time when he went as usual for the ripe apples. Members of different tribes can be distinguished by their different physique [144] and a Kitlobe, recognizing that the woman was a Bella Coola, asked her how she came to be with Tcikisa. She told him how she had been sold, disgracefully, and he promised to help her return home. Telling her to conceal her plans, he bade her to be ready to flee early the following morning. At the appointed time he appeared, bringing dried olachen, grease, moccasins, and other equipment, wrapped in a seal's stomach. He sketched on the ground the overland route to Kimsquit, telling her how many affluents of the Kitlobe River she must pass before following one to the south, thence across the divide, and down the Kimsquit River.

The woman started out, but after several days of travel realized that she had passed the place where she should turn south, and was lost. In point of fact, she was at this time near Ootsa Lake. She headed back in the hope of recovering her trail, but snow fell and she could go no farther; to make matters worse she had consumed all her olachen, and most of the grease. The unfortunate woman sought shelter under a big tree, where in time she was completely covered with snow. Every day she ate a small

*539 a large cave in the vicinity where the hunters smoked the meat and boiled
[224] down the grease and marrow, but they had killed so many that it was January before their task was completed. Meanwhile the smell of flesh had attracted a number of martens which were caught in snares; in fact, they captured enough for two blanket-robes. When ready to leave for home, they prepared snow-shoes and on these safely negotiated the deep drifts and reached the village where all hope of their safety had long been abandoned. Sānuxmāxots arrived at dusk and heard his parents weeping and wailing; he asked who had died and found that they were mourning for him. His safe return turned their lamentations into rejoicings and a herald was sent out to call in the villagers to share the good news. When finally packed in, there was enough goat meat for an elaborate potlatch.[11]

[226] A year or two later, four men prepared to set out one afternoon to fish for trout. As they were leaving, Sānuxmāxots's young son begged to be taken along and cried so piteously that they at last consented. So they wrapped him carefully in a goat-skin blanket, and placed him in the bottom of the canoe which they paddled about six miles upstream. They landed on the bank, cooked a meal, and dried black spruce branches over [226] the fire to serve as torches to lure the fish within range of their spears. When night had fallen, they began to drift downstream, one man holding aloft a brand while the others speared. They had fair success, but nothing noteworthy occurred until, as they neared Nusdalst, they saw white on the water, and paddled slowly forward, thinking it must be a huge flock of swans. As they drew nearer they saw that it was snow; a huge slide had swept over the village and blocked the channel of the river. The water, no longer able to flow westward, was swirling back to the east, and the fishermen drifted with it until they found a place to camp for the night with their young companion.

As soon as it was light, they returned to the scene of the disaster and found a deep bed of snow over the site of the village. They landed to investigate, and called repeatedly, hoping that some at least had escaped. At last they heard an answer and began to dig, imagining that it must be Sānuxmāxots himself. After excavating a deep hole, they unburied the sole survivor, a slave who had escaped by covering with a copper the [11] It will be noticed that there are many points of similarity between this story

[538] and the one in vol. II, p. 512. It is possible that they are versions of the same account, [551] but it seems more likely that they refer to different incidents of which the principal character of one has been forgotten. In such cases the Bella Coola, believing that individuals with the same name often have the same characteristics, frequently give to the hero of an earlier incident the name of a person who has figured in a similar one within recent years.

to the aesthetic, their skill in dancing and dramatics is noteworthy: no one who has witnessed a native dance can fail to have been impressed by the performance of the participants and the stage-craft of the carpenters. The fact that no system of writing had ever been devised has prevented the establishment of a native literature, but the practice of passing down an extensive folklore by word of mouth shows their narrative powers as well as their faculty for remembering details. At present it is difficult to appreciate what must have been their energy in earlier times when they faced the struggle for existence, armed with stone tools. Abundant salmon gave them adequate food, but only when weirs had been built with great labour. Though game was plentiful, the hunter was equipped with nothing more formidable than a bow and arrow. The simplest task required patience and skill undreamed of by the average white man. If the reader will allow his imagination to carry him backwards two hundred years, he will realize that the mere provision of food and clothing necessitated constant effort and ceaseless exertion.

Hand in hand with many admirable characteristics, the Bella Coola display others which strike the white man as unprepossessing. A first impression is the untidiness of their houses. Exteriorly, they are often fairly neat, but confusion reigns within. Clothing, instead of being hung up, is left lying on the floor; bed-coverings are piled carelessly; dirty dishes cover the tables; dogs and children swarm over the floor; flies abound; all is dirty and slovenly. The house itself may be uncompleted; a window lacks glass and has been boarded up; the roof leaks, or the steps are falling down. Nor are the surroundings more attractive. There is one struggling flower-bed in the village, but elsewhere the houses are surrounded by wastes of mud where horses and cattle wander, dogs prowl, and children play. In the distance the mountain peaks rise in splendour, but near at hand all is squalid and unkempt.

They are only slightly more particular about their personal appearance. Dirt does not distress them. They wash occa-

dancers. Sninia differs from most supernatural beings in having his residence in this world instead of in the land above. 776*

Among the beings dwelling in the upper region are a number of Xemxemtnum, whose function it is to ask the sun to appear every day. It travels without their assistance, but if they neglected to arouse it, darkness would prevail all day. The only knowledge of these beings is derived from information given by the first people; they have not been seen by mortals since early days and do not act as patrons for kusiut dancers. [821]

Heat and Cold are regarded by the Bella Coola as anthropomorphic beings, but their beliefs concerning them have not become crystallized, perhaps because of their non-appearance as patrons of kusiut dancers. The following story is told of the annual meeting of Heat and Cold. 776* 821 539

Every spring Cold, Snuikulus, meets Heat, Sqwālīlus, in some undefined locality and says:

"You will not be welcome in the place to which you are going [the earth]. I have just come from there. People like to get up on cool mornings to start work, they won't pay any attention to you."

But Sqwālīlus replies: "No. They will welcome me. Everyone prefers to spend a few extra minutes in bed in the mornings. It is pleasant to do so when it is warm, hence I shall be welcome in spite of the eagerness of mankind for work."

In spite of its apparent definiteness, this account is regarded merely as a story, and it is doubtful if any historical accuracy is attached to it. The Bella Coola laugh when it is told, and the irony of the conversation is not lost on them.

S'ps', the Cold Wind, is another anthropomorphized being belonging to the realm of stories rather than to that of everyday life and profound belief. His wife is Alāla, and their child is Ice. On a cold morning, if a Bella Coola finds ice on liquid left in a bucket or other container, he warms it at a fire until he can lift off the sheet, and throws it out of the door, saying as he does so: "Alālao··,[10] your child has become cold." 776* 821

* 776 encountered on land, but the sea likewise is the home of anthropomorphic creatures. Far beneath the surface is a land much [772] like the earth, inhabited by people resembling humans who sometimes assist a drowning person. The mysteries of this undersea world are known to the Bella Coola chiefly through accounts handed down from generation to generation, though its inhabitants have often appeared at the surface. Their hair is long and somewhat reddish, their bodies are hairless, and their faces are in many cases stained with black. One man stated that about three years before a Japanese, fishing near Namu, had caught in his net one of these people, a girl about two years old. He drew her into his boat, where she squatted on the bottom, docile and submissive. After a time the fisherman became frightened and threw his captive overboard. The [648] Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella, greater seafarers than [186] themselves, have more extensive knowledge of these undersea dwellers.

● 539 Similar, if not identical, beings live beneath rivers and lakes; they have often been seen on the surface, and occa- * 776 sionally, long, long ago, certain fortunate individuals saw their houses. Accounts of such are embodied in Bella Coola mythology and will be described later. The following can be considered an example of a simple type:

About three hundred years ago, Lewumrewumlaix, a Kimsquit fisherman, built a pier-like framework, projecting into the Dean River, on which to stand while fishing for salmon with a long-handled[11] scoop-net. One August day he was using his net when, after a number of successful sweeps, it became very heavy. As the net came to the surface he found, to his amazement, that a small boy was hanging on the rim. A number of people who had been watching from the shore, called to him to throw away his net with its uncanny haul. Heedless of this advice, Lewumrewumlaix tried to lift his net and, on finding it too heavy, began to draw it through the water so as to drag it out on the shore. All went well for the first few yards, till suddenly the boy shoved against the net, pushing the fisherman into the water on the other side of the pier. Immediately the supernatural one vanished from sight. As the bystanders rushed to [11]The handles of nets of this type are said to have been about thirty feet in length.

776*

the rescue of Lwumxwumlais they saw him being carried downstream to a salmon-weir about three hundred yards below. The trap was raised at once, but it was too late; the rash fisherman was dead. No one could give a name to the supernatural being who had caused his death; it was merely one of those dwelling under the river. [539] [761]

Whales, too, are sometimes observed in the rivers, but though they appear to resemble those of the ocean they are really their supernatural prototypes. [825]

These human-like dwellers beneath the water can, as in this case, cause death, but they are usually regarded as uncanny rather than dangerous. But there is one undersea being whom the Bella Coola regard with unmixed awe; he is Ẓemoqwa (see Plate 10), lord of the supernatural ones beneath the ocean, as Alqantlem is lord of those dwelling above. He lives in an enormous house under the sea wherein the fish, the sea-mammals, and the sea-plants have their home. The Bella Coola believe that these beings can take human form at will,* and assume that their behaviour in Ẓemoqwa's dwelling corresponds to that of human beings in the house of an earthly chief. In the beginning of time, when men were more powerful than in recent years, this house sometimes rose to the surface of the water and adventurous Bella Coola entered it on various occasions, leaving to their descendants tales of the wonders it contained. These accounts have become family myths and are described with others of similar type in Chap. vi, vol. I. Records of this kind vary greatly in detail; in fact, few agree more than in broad outline. Sometimes it is stated that denizens of the sea appear in Ẓemoqwa's house in the flesh; other myths describe paintings of sea creatures around the walls and the manner in which these are brought to life by Ẓemoqwa. Irrespective of the exact details, it is clear that he is chief of the undersea beings who serve him and hunt for him, the blackfish being especially proficient in this respect. Ẓemoqwa resents any slight to his protégés and punishes any mortal who is unkind to them. [761] 773 776* [424] [184]

*Bella Coola concepts concerning the transformability of man and animals will be described in the next section of this chapter.

*776 Although Ḷomoqwa has often been seen by mortals, no one has ever been able to describe his countenance. He always wears a huge hat, beneath which his blackened face, covered with eagle down, is barely visible, since he constantly keeps turning it away from the observer. Occasionally he comes to the surface and has been known even to walk on it. Like other supernatural beings, he is able to ascend to Nasmāt-a, though it is not his home. The dread with which the Bella Coola regard Ḷomoqwa is due to his ability to suck canoes down to his home at the bottom of the ocean as if in a whirlpool. He is usually hungry, and nothing pleases him more than human flesh. None the less, he does not destroy life without cause. It angers him to hear his name spoken, so no Bella Coola utters [502] it when on the ocean, for fear that he may be engulfed. Whenever a person is drowned at sea it is believed that the cannibal- [761] istic Ḷomoqwa has drawn him down for a meal.

●539 To insert the many stories describing Ḷomoqwa at this point *776 would unduly break the continuity of this account, so the following simple example must suffice.

Not many years ago four Bella Bella fishermen were trying to anchor near China Hat. Owing to the action of the supernatural beings dwelling below, the bottom of the ocean rose and lowered abruptly so that their anchor would not hold as the rope was in many cases too short. They were much annoyed by this and, as they strove to fasten their craft, they were exasperated at a lard-fish which kept swimming closely around the canoe. At last one of the fishermen reached out, seized it with his hands, and tore it to pieces, throwing these back on the water. Presently their anchor held and the four went to sleep. But Ḷomoqwa had seen the insult shown to the lard-fish and, as they slept, he sucked down their canoe until, on awakening, they found themselves in the huge house of the lord of the underseas world. There was no water in it, but they recognized where they must be from the fact that the walls were decorated with paintings of marine beings and with ancient tools from canoes lost at sea. An old woman who lives in Ḷomoqwa's house called the four to her fire in the corner and asked them whether they had any false hellebore with them. If they had, they would escape, but otherwise nothing could save them from Ḷomoqwa, who at that very moment was calling his friends for a feast of human flesh. Presently Ḷomoqwa entered, followed in succession by a number of underseas chiefs, including the dreaded point, Mesatche Nose, in human form. As each came in, water swirled in and the canoe was tossed as if in a whirlpool; if it had capsized the occupants would have been devoured, but on each occasion one of the hunters threw a morsel of false hellebore on the surface, which stilled the waves. At last Ẉmoqwa and his friends admitted defeat, granted the four fishermen the powers of shamans, and gave them certain prerogatives. 539 776

Though Ẉmoqwa is usually unkind to mortals, and is correspondingly feared, instances are known in which he has bestowed shamanistic powers for no apparent reason. The Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella know more about Ẉmoqwa than they do, since he is essentially an ocean being and the Bella Bella are ocean people. It is possible that the Bella Coola concepts of this supernatural personage are entirely of Bella Bella origin. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that Ẉmoqwa seldom appears in connection with the kusiut society, but frequently with the nusak society, many of the rites of which came from Bella Bella. [756] 177 776* [575]

Since human beings can travel on the sea only by means of canoes, it is not surprising that the Bella Coola think of supernatural beings as doing likewise. Their beliefs include at least three huge canoes, manned by supernatural beings. The most important is that of Nuákynum,[18] the name of its captain, whose crew consists of a number of supernatural birds and the hermaphrodite. Every year they come from the lands of the salmon and the berries, in the far west beyond the sea, and bear these to the coast of British Columbia. This belief, which runs counter to the conviction that Alqantlm caused the animals and plants to grow, is merely one of the many inconsistencies of Bella Coola theology. Nuákynum comes every autumn on his way to attend the gathering of the supernatural beings in the land above, and his arrival in the Bella Coola River marks the commencement of the kusiut dances. He is one of the most important of kusiut patrons and his powers and functions are described in the chapter devoted to that 773 776* [575] of the ocean, one of the members is awakened by the rhythmical beat of the paddles of the War-Party of the Tide. If he is wise he at once calls out, "Hi . . . ." This serves to keep the War-Party at a distance, and to waken the rest of the party who hastily throw on the fire objects which have been in contact with the human body. 776* 789

Many stories are told by the Bella Coola of the appearance of the War-Party of the Tide. The following can be regarded as typical. 539● 776*

A few years ago, a hunter named Ooikstl, and his wife, Anaqwiáli, were encamped on Labouchere Channel at the point known as Nazqul, near the Hot Springs. They were discussing a private matter when, to the amazement of both, their dog, who was with them, joined in the conversation. This unnatural behaviour should have warned them of approaching danger and they ought to have killed the animal, as indeed the woman desired to do. But Ooikstl foolishly refused and presently they lay down to sleep. In some mysterious manner the dog was able to summon the War-Party of the Tide, which carried the two away. When they awoke they were in the dread canoe, and the poison from Sals-al' was spreading over them. They were powerless and could only lie still as the canoe travelled up South Bentinck Arm, circled the island near Tális at its head, and three other islands on the return journey. The two were put ashore at their camp, apparently unharmed, but they knew the danger to which they had been exposed and fled next day to Kimsquit. The woman told a shaman what had happened and accepted his somewhat drastic treatments. Consequently, though she showed signs of insanity, she was cured. The headstrong Ooikstl, on the other hand, refused to pay attention to the danger; within a few weeks he became crazy, and then died.

Quite another category of Bella Coola supernatural beings consists of ghosts. These beings, once human, have passed by death into the ranks of the supernatural. Their home is the land below the earth, where they live like mortals except that everything is strange and ethereal. In form they resemble human beings, but their faces are green and weird. They can visit the land of the living at will, and make their presence known by whistling, which is their language. Their actions are the reverse of those of humans; for example, they often 775 talons resembling, but larger than, those of an eagle. It has no tail. The great strength of these animals rests in the fact that their eyes revolve in their sockets, so that, when reversed, piercing beams shoot forth which strike senseless anyone on whom they fall. Having thus stunned its victim, the sminiq picks him up and stuffs him into a broad-mouthed basket, carried on the back. It is provided with spikes inclined inwards and downwards so that a person thrust within cannot climb out. Human beings are carried in this way to the beast's lair, a cave in the mountains, where they are devoured at leisure. Wolves always accompany sminiq; in fact, they may almost be termed attendants upon them (see vol. II, chap. v). Like other supernatural creatures, sminiq are impervious to most mortal weapons, but there is one method of overcoming them. If a hunter cut himself on the under side of his right leg so that the blood flows freely, and smears a bullet with this, it can kill a sminiq. Similar success is gained by biting the tongue and coating the bullet with blood so obtained.

Another animal which is rendered powerless by the same charm is the boqs. This beast somewhat resembles a man, its hands especially, and the region around the eyes being distinctly human. It walks on its hind legs, in a stooping posture, its long arms swinging below the knees; in height it is rather less than the average man. The entire body, except the face, is covered with long hair, the growth being most profuse on the chest which is large, corresponding to the great strength of the animal. The most peculiar feature of the animal is its penis, which is so long that it must be rolled up and carried in the arms when the creature is walking; it terrifies its enemies by striking tree-trunks and breaking branches with its uncoiled organ. It is said that a woman was once drawing water at the edge of a stream when a boqs, concealed on the other shore, extended its penis under the water to the further bank and held intercourse with her. The contact rendered her powerless, as if turned to stone; she could neither flee nor remove the organ. Her companions tried unsuccessfully to cut the organ until one of them brought a salalberry leaf, whereupon the monster, dreading its razor-like edge, withdrew. 539 776 *

The following stories illustrate, better than any description, the attitude of the Bella Coola towards these animals.

Not many years ago a certain Qak'lis was encamped with his wife and child in the Bay of the Thousand Islands, Altukwlāksos, about two miles above Namu, one of the haunts of boqs. He heard a number of the creatures in the forest behind him and seized his gun, at the same time calling out to them to go away. Instead, the breaking of branches and beating upon tree-trunks came nearer. Becoming alarmed, he called out once more: "Go away, or you shall feel my power." They still approached and Qak'lis fired in the direction of the sounds. There followed a wild commotion in the forest, roars, grunts, pounding, and the breaking of branches. The hunter, now thoroughly alarmed, told his wife and child to embark in the canoe while he covered their retreat with his gun. He followed them without molestation, and anchored his craft not far from shore. The boqs could be heard plainly as they rushed to and fro on the beach, but only the vague outlines of their forms were visible in the darkness. Presently, though there was no wind, the canoe began to roll as if in a heavy sea. Qak'lis decided to flee to Restoration Bay, but before he had gone far his paddle struck the bottom, although he was in mid-channel. Looking up, he saw that the mountains were higher than usual; the boqs had, by their supernatural power, raised the whole area so that the water had been almost entirely drained away. They are the only supernatural beings with this power. Qak'lis jumped overboard into water which reached only to his knees, and towed his canoe to Restoration Bay, the boqs following him along the shore.[10] [823]

This is not the only occasion on which boqs have appeared near Restoration Bay. Within the life-time of the father of an informant, a chief set out with some friends from Kwatna, bound for Namu. They travelled overland to Restoration Bay, thence by canoe, making the journey without incident. When returning, they decided to gather clams on the rocky point of the bay. As the craft shot around the tip of the promontory, they saw a boqs gathering shell-fish. The paddlers backed their canoe behind some rocks whence they could [10]One of the features which the Bella Coola consider most surprising about this incident is that he did not tread upon the fish which must have been driven into the shallows. [825]

539, 776 watch without being seen. The creature acted as if frightened; it kept looking backwards, then hurriedly scraped up some clams with its forepaws, dashed off with these into the forest, and came back for more. The chief decided to attack the animal. A frontal approach was impossible owing to lack of cover, so he landed and crept stealthily through the forest, armed with his Hudson's Bay Company's musket. Presently he stumbled upon a heap of clams which the animal had collected. He waited until it returned with another load, then raised his musket and fired. Instead of killing the boqs, its supernatural power was so great that the hunter's musket burst in his hands, though he himself was not injured. The boqs shrieked and whistled as if in anger, and at once hordes of its mates came dashing out through the forest. The frightened chief rushed out on the beach and called to his comrades to save him. They brought the canoe close to the shore so that he could clamber aboard, and then paddled away unharmed.

177 776 539 The Bella Coola believe that boqs, unlike most supernatural animals, have not abandoned the country since the coming of the white man. One man was most insistent that they still lived on King Island, and promised to point one out if a visit were made to that spot. This man refuses to camp at the place where, he affirmed, boqs are common. Another informant stated that though he had never seen one of the monsters, a horde of them surrounded his camp near Canoe Crossing for a week. Every night he heard them roaring and beating on trees and branches. A curious blending of old and new beliefs was recorded in connection with this statement. This man remarked that he was once gathering firewood when he heard the creatures closing in upon him. His head swam with terror, until he remembered that he was a Christian; he called on Jesus to help him, grasped his axe, and dashed towards the place from which the loudest sounds were coming. He heard the animals moving off all round him, but failed to see any of them.

Boḑs have been heard as recently as 1924 according to popular belief. In January of that year a number of young Bella Coola were returning home in a motor-boat from Ocean Falls. They camped for the night on Burke Channel, and were alarmed to hear a crashing of bushes and a beating on tree-trunks. Thoroughly frightened, they directed the beams of several electric torches in the direction of the sounds without avail and at last started the engine of their motor-boat, the noise of which frightened the boḑs away. 539 776*

An animal somewhat similar to the boḑs is the ālākwis. The Bella Coola state that long, long ago, these lived as human beings near Port John on Evans Arm, King Island. They were a strange people, with peculiar rites including the worship of fire. Their neighbours, the Bella Bella, from whom they differed entirely, determined to destroy the ālākwis. A massacre took place, and only a few survivors escaped to an island in one of the lakes in the interior of King Island. Here, in course of generations, they grew hairy and lost their human characteristics; it is said that a few paintings made by them are still visible there. Not many years ago some Bella Coola saw what may have been the last surviving ālākwis. Two hairy creatures were observed fishing from a skin boat on Burke Channel. As soon as they realized that they were observed they dashed ashore, broke up the framework of their canoe, and plunged into the forest carrying its skin covering. Nothing more seems to be known concerning them, nor do they appear ever to have granted supernatural assistance to anyone. 776* 829

Another supernatural creature is the bābınk'. It somewhat resembles a cow, although its legs are shorter and its body, which is white and hairless, is heavier. In spite of its awkward build, this animal can move so rapidly as to catch birds and animals with its tongue, which can be shot forth to a tremendous length. Various incidents are related concerning bābınk'. One of its characteristics is that it causes gales. The country where one lives is invariably denuded of underbrush and even pebbles; everything movable is blown away, leaving only trees 776* [821] [778]

* 776 and gaping holes in the earth. In such regions no fire can be
[778] lit. The last known area of this kind is up the river behind Green Bay, about four miles from the sea. So far as could be learnt, bäbunk' have never assisted Bella Coola in any way nor played any part in the social life of the community. They are feared on account of their supernatural power, but appear so seldom that they are practically disregarded.

More common than the last, and accordingly more important, is the haohao. It is an enormous bird with bony wings and long, flexible beak. As it flies, the wings rattle violently, and its note, an oft repeated "Hao, hao, hao," can be heard for miles. These birds are said to have been numerous in former [535] years, and are well known to all Bella Coola. Masked figures [575] representing them are often used at kusiut dances. The haohao is feared for its practice of inserting its long beak into the 761 rectum of anyone sleeping carelessly in the forest and drawing
* 776 forth his entrails. This can be prevented by standing upright [789] a staff, such as all hunters carry, before going to sleep.

● [539] A popular story states that once, not many years ago, a number of men camped at the edge of a canyon near their home, without taking this precaution. One of them was awakened by a slight movement of one of his companions and, looking up, he saw the long neck and beak of a haohao projecting over the rim of the canyon and sucking his partner's entrails. The convulsive shiver of the stricken man had awakened him. With his bow he shot an arrow into the bird's neck, causing it to disappear over the brink. Presently the long beak reappeared and he discharged another arrow with the same result. Again and again this happened until the attack ceased at dawn. The hunter assumed that a single bird had been repeatedly attacking, but when he looked over the edge of the cliff, he saw below a number of carcasses, each with an arrow in its throat. The canyon must have been a roosting place for the birds. His companions seemed still asleep, but when he investigated he found that all were dead; only the slightly enlarged orifice showed how they had been killed.

* 776 No haohao has been seen within recent years, but one infor-789 mant and her husband heard them on the south side of the Bella Coola River about two miles from the sea. They would have

761 a woman now in middle age is said to have guided a white man
* 776 to the spot. Through a telescope he saw an enormous animal, and passed the instrument to a Kimsquit Indian in the party. He, too, saw it, but the effect was so powerful that he soon died. Theoretically, a man may receive supernatural aid from one of these monsters, but practically they are regarded as entirely evil and to be avoided.

●539 The creature to which the term snusx is most often applied
* 776 is one that lives in lakes; it has a huge mouth and can suck with incredible force. More specifically, this animal is termed [778] a skämtsk. One is said to have lived not long ago at Winter Bay, about six miles from Bella Coola, and a small one is said to be living even now in Ootsa Lake. The Bella Coola tell a number of stories concerning the skämtsk; the following is a typical account, and others will be given with folk-tales in a later chapter.

Within the life-time of an informant, two youths, a chief's son and a poor man's son, went to swim in one of the small lakes near Ootsa Lake. The chief's son who was ready first, swam out, wearing a fancy belt, leaving his companion on the shore. When the latter was on the point of diving in he heard a dreadful sucking noise, combined with an ominous crackling. He called to the swimmer asking him if he, too, heard it.

"Yes," came the answer, "But it is nothing," and the youth continued his swim.

As the noise grew louder the boy on the bank cried out: "Come back, come back, there is something bad there that we do not understand."

His friend in the water again answered: "Oh! There is nothing wrong."

The noise increased; sticks and stones were sucked from the bank and flew out towards the centre of the lake. The suction eventually grew so great that the youth on land was forced to clutch a tree-trunk with his arms, while his legs fluttered out towards the lake like pennants in a strong wind. The strain on his arms was so terrific that he was almost forced to relinquish his grip before the suction subsided. When he looked at the lake the swimmer had vanished.

The survivor returned to the village and reported what had happened. No one believed his story; instead, he was made a prisoner, accused of having killed the chief's son. For a week the people questioned him daily without being able to shake his story; then they resolved to kill him. The youth, learning of this decision, concluded that he might as well face the unknown peril of the lake as the certain death to be meted out by his fellows, so he asked them to allow him to go swimming in the lake to prove that something dangerous was there. They granted that request, as well as a further one, that he be sewn up in a tight-fitting suit of caribou-skin, and armed with a knife. 539 ● 776*

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"Now come with me," he said to his fellow-villagers when he was ready.

They waited on the shore while he swam out into the lake singing. Presently the crackling and sucking sound was heard, and soon the spectators were forced to clutch tree-trunks to keep themselves from being drawn into the lake, while their legs were blown out horizontally as the youth's had been on the previous occasion. When the wind subsided the swimmer had vanished.

He had been sucked into the stomach of a sk̓ämtsk without being killed. Groping around, he found the corpse of the chief's son from which he cut the belt and put it on himself. Then he made his way to the neck of the monster, cut a hole through it, and dived out. The surface was so far up that he was at his last gasp when his head rose above it. He swam ashore and the evidence of the belt confirmed his story. The carcass of the sk̓ämtsk floated to the surface not long afterwards.

In addition to the anthropomorphic beings already described as resident beneath the surface of the ocean, supernatural animal monsters also dwell there. One of the most dreaded is the kuxta, which suck wooden objects down to the bottom of the sea. It resembles pitch, and when once it comes in contact with a canoe, it cannot be removed. The Bella Coola attribute supernatural power to the octopus also, thus increasing the dread with which the animal would be regarded in any case. They believe that it is fond of gum and frequently comes to land to obtain it. It is said that the gum is never voided, but remains in a suck within the creature's stomach. One informant stated that within his mother's lifetime, a man walking near Tāl·io heard a smacking sound, like someone chewing noisily. He knew what must be the cause, but idly decided to investigate. It was an octopus. The beast was clambering down from the tree, using two of its arms to help it. Not realizing his danger, the man allowed himself to be 776* [825] 539 776*

539 seized and carried to the shore. He had thought that it would
* 776 be easy to free himself, but he found it impossible and was carried under the sea. He bit frantically at the enfolding arms, until he succeeded in freeing his own, with which he pushed up the beak of the octopus, thus killing it. He rose to the surface and returned home none the worse.

[825] The Bella Coola do not profess to know all the animals of the world; and if they see a strange one, they assume it to be one known to their ancestors though unfamiliar to them.
539 Since any unknown animal is considered to have supernatural 761 power, due care must be exercised when one is seen. The fol-
* 776 lowing incident illustrates this point.

825 The mother's brother of an informant worked for some thirty years for a white man in Victoria. His employer once sent him to see a turtle which was confined in a pool in a basement preparatory to being killed for a banquet. As soon as he saw it, he said:

"My parents in Bella Coola told me of such a creature."

A few days before Christmas the turtle was cut up and displayed on four platters in the window of the store; the Bella Coola saw it, and thus learned that it had been killed. The same night a sore appeared on his wrist, and by the next day it was large and running. He said to his employer:

"In a few days I will be dead. Do not grieve for me. The sight of such supernatural creatures is too powerful for Indians; I survived one experience, but twice has been too much for me and I will die."

His employer wisely sent him to a white doctor who cured him, although the scar remained. Years later the man returned to Bella Coola where he displayed the mark as proof of his story. A few weeks later he died, and the Bella Coola are firmly convinced that his death was due to his having seen the turtle many years before.

* 776 Although the forests of British Columbia abound with 789 supernatural animals of enormous power, the attitude of the [781] Bella Coola hunter who penetrates into lonely places is not one of constant fear. It is true that he may meet danger at any turn, but danger is part and parcel of human life, and he is by no means defenceless. He dreads the powers possessed by creatures of another plane, but they for their part dread certain human objects. Clothing which has been worn for so long that it has become steeped with the emanations of its

* 776 825 [774] and leapt away apparently uninjured. The Bella Coola say that yearling goats have very strong spirits (I, p. 94) which make possible such actions.

Though generally callous with regard to the sufferings of animals, the Bella Coola are usually careful not to kill more than they need; and knowledge of the supernatural power [224] [226] possessed by animals sometimes leads men to treat them with great consideration. For example, if a bull-head is caught in an olachen net in the river, the fisherman throws it back into the water, saying:

"I have saved you; please do the same for me."

The following incident, believed without question by the Bella Coola, shows the manner in which bull-heads help those who have often befriended them. About 1880 a Kimsquit fisherman, Ältakän·i, fell into a rapids where he was in great danger of drowning. A bull-head, seeing his plight and mindful of former help, increased his size and shoved Ältakän·i ashore with its nose.

"I have saved you, mortal," said the bull-head, as he did so.

The ability to increase in size is not restricted to fish, but is shared by small mammals and reptiles. Lizards, for instance, four feet in length, are said to live permanently in a pond about seven miles below Kimsquit; they are termed qwalās.

Toads, too, can aid mortals. If a man see a snake devouring one of them he will, if he is wise, kill the snake and say to the toad:

"Please help me when I am in difficulties."

A toad never forgets its obligations and if that man should fall into a river when the toad is near, the latter will grow large enough to drag him forth.

● 539 * 776 825 755 [753] Snakes are regarded with aversion and disgust. This may be in part due to the belief that they cook for Ältät·iaiutl (I, p. 49), but more because these reptiles enter the stomachs of human beings. The Bella Coola believe that snakes are the offspring of a supernatural Mother of Snakes, a mythical being of dread powers. The following story illustrates their beliefs concerning the danger of near approach to this creature: 539 ● 776 *

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

Ḱwilais was a man of mixed lineage, Kimsquit and Ṗa·s, near Newitte. With several companions he was gathering berries when he stepped into a hole and felt numerous tiny creatures crawling over his legs. Looking down, he saw that they were small snakes, that had just been hatched from a Mother of Snakes. He fled, terrified, pursued by the reptiles, which he managed to keep off to some extent by brushing behind him a branch of spiny swamp gooseberry, a known deterrent. When he had out-distanced the snakes he called his companions, told them of his adventure, and returned home. There he repeated the tale. Though Ḱwilais did not know it, many of the snakes had succeeded in entering his stomach. Presently he began to swell; his body became larger and larger until he was in danger of bursting. The reptiles within were breeding rapidly. Luckily, one of his fellow villagers knew the proper remedy. A raised bed was made for the sufferer about five feet from the ground where Ḱwilais stretched himself on a number of thorny branches, while his friends built a fire of devil's club and swamp gooseberry twigs so that he was fumigated in the smoke. Then, to give greater potency, they cast on the flames soiled clothing and pounded cedar-bark pads stained with menstrual blood; even this was of no avail, so finally a woman squeezed out into a vessel some of her menstrual blood which Ḱwilais drank. This killed the snakes. The patient began to vomit, emitting a mass of wriggling serpents, and at once began to grow thinner, soon regaining his normal condition. Had he not been able to eject the reptiles, he would have died. 825 755 [789] [753] [841]

Ḱwilais was not the only one to have this unpleasant experience. Many others have suffered in the same way, but in no case has anyone been able to feel the snakes at the actual place or time of entry.

The beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the power possessed by animals are clearly shown by their attitude with regard to killing them. Man is immortal, so are animals. Alquntäm decreed that beasts and birds should serve as food for mankind, but it is only their clothing, their worthless "blanket of flesh," as the Bella Coola express it, which they give to hunters. In the autumn leaves appear to die, but every spring they are reborn. Similarly, when an animal is slain, it merely discards its visible self while its spirit[n] ascends 825 775 224 [774]

The most spectacular of Raven's exploits was the theft of the sun in order to provide light for the world (I, p. 298). In this case, a valuable object was acquired for mankind, but often Raven interfered with the kindly aims of Älquntäm, a point illustrated in the following account of the origin of death:[36]

539 776* 761 [821]

In the beginning of time, before people had really become human, Raven made a boy from his own body, gave him life, and called him O·mietlmai. His creation was Raven's chief joy. The youth was beautiful; his feet and hands were especially small and light-coloured, and Raven gloried in what he had been able to do without the assistance of his friend Yulätimut, the Carpenter. All went well until O·mietlmai was about fifteen years of age when Älquntäm wanted to find out about this being which Raven had created. Accordingly, he sent to earth one of his Snulsälktäls to carry off O·mietlmai. At that time there were four Snulsälktäls in Nusmät·a, huge, eagle-like, supernatural birds under the especial care of Älquntäm himself. Down swooped one of these creatures and carried the youth aloft to Nusmät·a, where he was treated as a guest by Älquntäm.

Raven, ignorant of the reason for his loss, was heart-broken. He pulled out his hair and for four days sat and pondered. Then he decided to wage war on the Snulsälktäls, not knowing that the latter had been acting by command of Älquntäm. Raven went to Yulätimut and asked him to make a huge whale. The carpenter was surprised and enquired about the purpose, whereupon Raven told him of the loss of O·mietlmai, and how he hoped that the Snulsälktäls would be lured into swooping down to fight the dummy and would be vanquished. Yulätimut agreed to help him and worked for four days on a gigantic cedar, chiselling it out like a canoe, but in the shape of an enormous whale. Then for four days he gathered gum and covered the wooden monster with a layer about an inch thick; finally he painted the outer surface to resemble a whale. It was a very fine piece of work. That night Raven asked Yulätimut to launch it. The stomach had been weighted so that it could either sink or float and there was room for a man inside to steer it. The whale acted according to specification, diving and rising easily, moving to right or left according to the wishes of the helmsman. Raven was delighted.

Early next morning Yulätimut again launched the craft at Raven's request, and it wallowed around near the shore like a real whale. Älquntäm saw it, and despatched one of his Snulsilkiäls to fetch it. He chose Nunusmaoak, "He Who Carries One," the Snulsilkiäls able to lift one of anything. Down swooped Nunusmaoak, and seized the dummy in his talons, but, as he flapped his wings in an effort to rise, they became stuck in the gum so that he could neither lift his quarry nor escape. When the whale dived he was drowned. Many people on the shore watched the struggle. Then Ālquntām despatched another Snulsilkiäls, Nunulnusek, "He Who Carries Two," who is able to carry two of anything. Nunulnusek likewise gripped the whale with his claws and succeeded in raising it slightly before his wings stuck in the gum and he, too, fell back and was drowned. Then Ālquntām sent down Nunuāsmusek, "He Who Carries Three," the Snulsilkiäls able to lift three of anything. Nunuāsmusek gripped the whale as his predecessors had done, and lifted it about ten feet in the air before his wings became stuck like those of the others, and he, too, fell back and was drowned. Ālquntām, much worried, called to him Nunumu·sek, "He Who Carries Four," the Snulsilkiäls able to carry four of anything, and despatched him after telling him how his three brothers had been overcome in their efforts to carry the monster away. Nunumu·sek swooped down with a powerful rush, gripped the whale firmly at the back of its neck, and carried it far aloft into the sky. Gradually the gum interfered with his wing-beats; they became more rapid and strained, until slowly he began to fall, still struggling. All the while his wings were being more and more hampered, till finally he, too, was powerless, and with a resounding splash fell with the whale into the water where he, likewise, was drowned. When no more Snulsilkiäls appeared, the helmsman inside guided his strange craft back to the beach, where he exhibited his prey to the spectators. The story does not record how he was able to disengage them from the gum and take them into his whale. All the people were amazed at the dead Snulsilkiäls, for their huge bony wings resembled nothing ever seen before.

Raven was not satisfied with his success, because, though he had slain the Snulsilkiäls, he had not recovered O·mistimai. He went to his house still weeping at the loss of his child. Ālquntām and O·mistimai had seen Raven's sorrow, and the former sent the boy back. When O·mistimai entered the house he said to Raven:

"Don't cry. Here I am. I saw your grief and have returned."

Raven looked at the speaker and replied: "No. You are not my son. He had beautiful flowing locks."

O·mistimai had indeed appeared without any hair on his head, but he explained his loss by saying:

"Truly I am your son, O·mistimai. I have been up in Nusmāt·a where there was such a gale that my hair was blown away."

Raven, blinded by his grief, did not believe him, and responded angrily:

"No, youare not my son. Why do you lie to me? Get out of this house."

Disgusted at this reception, O·mietlmai obeyed. Just as he was passing through the doorway, Raven noticed the tattoo marks on his legs, and realized that, in spite of the change in his appearance, the visitor was really his son. He called on him to return, but O·mietlmai paid no attention to his father's entreaties and sped far away. Raven's grief was beyond expression, but he could do nothing to repair the damage he had done. If it had not been for Raven's mistake, all mortals would return to life four days after death. [304]

The above myth is widely known among the Bella Coola, and is supposed to be historically accurate. At the same time, few people allow it to influence their thoughts with regard to death or its causes. It is a fact, but one that belongs to the realm of ancient history rather than to everyday experience. When a Bella Coola dies, his relatives, though they know that his death is due to the folly of Raven, tacitly overlook this, and do not feel bitterly towards Raven. Bella Coola beliefs and theology are not systematized, hence it is quite possible for a person to realize a certain fact, such as the cause of death, and yet disregard it entirely. Considering that absolute contradictions can be believed simultaneously, it is not difficult to picture the mental attitude of people who believe, and at the same time disregard their belief.

One of Raven's spectacular, and at the same time, beneficial exploits was the bringing of sockeye salmon to the Bella Coola River.[17]

In the beginning of time, no sockeye salmon inhabited the rivers, and Raven determined to supply them. First he tried making wooden fish and throwing them into the water, but though he could animate them, they always died after jumping a few times. The reason for his failure, though he did not know it, was because he had omitted the small bone [774]

[17]This is an example of conflicting beliefs. In addition to assuming that salmon were sent down by Alquntam to furnish food for mankind, and that Raven supplied them in the beginning of time, the Bella Coola also believe that they are brought each year both by Nostkynum and Winwina. [771]

at the back of the neck; this is called nulkālxita by the Bella Coola and it is thought to be especially important since the spirit (I, p. 94) is located there. Somewhat discouraged by his lack of success, Raven sat holding his head in his hands, pondering. Finally, he decided that he would have to visit Miāltawa, the land of the salmon far beyond the western ocean.

His self-propelling canoe, Tobnkl, was soon made ready and Raven invited Mouse, a young woman, to accompany him. The two travelled without incident till they came to the flat land where the salmon had their homes. On the beach were myriads of canoes, each in reality the skin of a sockeye salmon. Raven had instructed Mouse to remain in his canoe, so when the sockeye salmon chief invited the two to his house only Raven accepted, though Mouse was urged most courteously to accompany him. Raven was conducted to the house, where his host threw his own daughter into the river. She changed into a sockeye salmon and swam to the beach; some of her father's servants cut her up and brought her to the house where she was cooked. The meal was set before the guest whom the chief instructed not to eat any of the bones. As he ate, Raven examined the salmon very carefully to see what had been lacking in his model, and soon discovered it to be the thin bone, shaped like a maple leaf, at the back of the neck. Seizing an opportunity when no one was looking, Raven secreted this bone against the palate of his mouth. When the meal was over and the guest had tied what was left of the food into a mat, someone collected all the bones and threw them into the river. Forthwith they became a sockeye salmon, which swam towards the shore. But after an instant, the fish began to behave peculiarly, swimming around madly in circles, and jumping in an aimless manner. Everyone agreed that a bone must have been lost, and they searched the house for it without success. They also examined Raven. Finally, one man thought of investigating the guest's mouth where they found the missing bone.

"Oh," said Raven, lying: "I did not know it was there."

As soon as the bone was thrown into the river the sockeye salmon became normal and swam quietly to the beach where it changed into the chief's daughter once more.

When the time came to leave, Raven asked the chief to tell his daughter to take his bundle of food to his canoe for him. Meanwhile Mouse had carried out Raven's instructions, which were to gnaw a hole in each of the sockeye salmon canoes. Raven entered Tobnkl before taking the parcel from the girl, and as he stepped in, the canoe was forced a little distance from the land so that she waded into the water to hand it to him. As she did so, he backed his canoe further out until

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

she had to follow him into water up to her waist. Then Raven suddenly grasped her under the arms, hauled her into his craft, and fled. The sockeye salmon men cried out in anger and leapt into their canoes for pursuit, but one by one they sank; Mouse had done her work well. For a time the chase was close; in fact, the sockeye salmon nearly caught Tobunkl in North Bentinck Arm, but as danger threatened, Raven seized a pole and delivered several vigorous thrusts which sent the canoe beyond the reach of the already sinking pursuers. The gashes made in the rocks by his shoves are still visible near the site of the Bella Coola Cannery, as well as the pole which he threw ashore when he had finished with it; it became petrified and can still be seen immediately behind the manager's house. At the south of the Bella Coola River, Raven threw the chief's daughter into the water. Her descendants are the sockeye salmon which visit that stream; and it is due to his failure to capture more than one, that so few sockeyes come to this river. 539 825 [778]

Another version of this myth was collected from a Kimsquit man.

It describes how Raven went alone in Tobunkl to the land of the salmon, in the guise of an old man. He was courteously received at the home of Skatpts, chief of the salmon, who gave him a meal of that fish. Raven carefully watched to ascertain what he had omitted from his wooden model, and when he found out that it was the bone at the back of the neck, he secreted one in the palate of his mouth. Presently one of the salmon women became ill, and Skatpts said:

"Old man, you have hidden a bone."

The salmon searched Raven, but failed to find what he had hidden, and he was able to return to Kimsquit with it. He added this bone to one of his models, and it was at once able to swim strongly; in fact, it became a real salmon.

This fish was the ancestor of all steel-head salmon, which are still called Samsamikdimut di Qwax, "The Salmon-like Fish of Raven." They are not considered as valuable for food as other salmon. [262]

Another exploit accredited to Raven in the beginning of time was the bringing of herring to Kimsquit.

None of these fish then inhabited the rivers, and Raven determined to bring them to increase the food supplies of his people. A gull happened to catch a single herring far from shore and brought it to Raven, who smeared Tobunkl with its scales. Then he set out for the land of the herring beyond the western ocean. On arriving, Raven went to the home [772]

539 of a woman, Sekakmän·a, who dwelt with her mother, a Gull. After a 825 meal, Raven lied to his hostess by telling her of the countless herring that lived at Kimsquit, and how happy he could make some of her relatives by taking them home with him. Sekakmän·a doubted the story and told one of her brothers to investigate Raven's canoe because, if the fish were plentiful at his home, some of the scales would certainly be in his craft. The herring youth looked inside the canoe, and was deceived by Raven's subterfuge. On receiving a favourable report, Sekakmän·a willingly gave Raven a large box filled with herring. Elated at his victory, Raven set out for home and threw his spoil into the water as he neared the beach at Kimsquit. The Kimsquit people knew of Raven's search for herring, and did not at first believe him when he reported his success, but the fish increased so rapidly that his claim was vindicated.

The herring so obtained were the progenitors of all that now live in the waters adjacent to Kimsquit.

262 One of the foods regarded by the Bella Coola as a luxury 824 is a foam-like whip prepared by beating up dried buffalo berries in water. Raven is given the credit for introducing this to 539 Bella Coola.

Long, long ago, Sluxlekwailx, a mountain in the Carrier country above Burnt Ridge, was a chief, possessing human characteristics. Buffalo berries flourished on his slopes, and he wanted to keep these for food for his guests. On one occasion he invited all the animals and birds, including Raven, to a feast and dance. His house was the interior of the mountain, and when all had assembled he carefully closed every opening so that none of the berries could escape. Raven determined to obtain some of this food for the Bella Coola, and accordingly used his power to force one of the guests to go outside. As soon as a door was opened to let him out, Raven seized some of the whip and flew away, scattering drops of it in his flight. Berries grew wherever the drops fell, and since that time everybody has been able to make this luxury. Sluxlekwailx was very angry, but could do nothing.

773 Though Älquntäm created the world, he did not make it perfect nor equip it with many of the conveniences possessed by men of the present generation. Raven, endowed both with imagination and tremendous power, was always seeking ways of improving conditions. In the beginning of time there were no mirrors, and if a man wanted to paint his face, or decorate [778] [823] himself for a dance, he was forced to rely on the assistance of

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

776 824 (II, p. 196). In this way the belief is kept before the eyes of the Bella Coola, but it is not a matter of prime importance in their lives. Rather contradictory is the concept that though each plant lack individual life, there is a supernatural mother of each species, corresponding in general terms to the Mother of Snakes described in the last section. As one informant expressed it:

"If there is no mother, how can a plant grow?"

These mothers are assumed to live beneath the ground. Occasionally, one of them has been discovered. Not many years ago, a number of women were collecting bracken roots when one which had been gathered began to turn into a snake. The women were alarmed and puzzled at this strange phenomenon. As they stood watching, the ground in front of them fell away as if there had been an earthquake, and they realized that the snake-root had been the mother of the plant. Without further fear they cooked and ate it.

776 823 Stones, too, and mountains were made by Ałquntām; consequently they have supernatural abilities and can understand the words and actions of mortals. When a wise man passes close beneath a precipitous mountain he always says to it:

"Please make yourself firm."

Most mountains, when requested politely, refrain from sliding and killing those passing beneath.

539 776 823 In former days mountains in many cases rose to meet hunters, and sometimes turned completely over. The Bella Coola are not sure whether this was caused by the mountain itself, or by a snuuq within. Wise hunters carry ropes with them when they penetrate into deep valleys, and when they feel the first tipping of a mountain they leap for a convenient tree, grasp it with their legs, heads downwards, and tie themselves in that position. Slowly the mountain rises and turns over, but, if the ropes do not break, the hunters suffer no ill effects. After a varying interval the mountain returns to its [789] normal position. This reversal can be hastened if a man bites

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

 539 776 823

his left cheek until the blood flows, takes also a mouthful of his own urine, and spits out the mixture.

The following instance of this belief was recorded. [789]

A Bella Coola chief and a number of followers were once at Kwatna where they had been gambling for stakes of mountain goat grease. Two of the men had lost their supply, so they went into the mountains between Kwatna and Restoration Bay to replenish it. They saw two goats, killed them, and at once two more appeared in the same place; these they also slew. When a fifth and sixth goat appeared and were likewise dispatched, one of the hunters tried to restrain his comrade, saying that such phenomenal success must be due to supernatural power which they should not abuse. They stopped firing, cut the grease from their quarry, and started on the return journey. Presently the mountain began to tilt upwards before their feet. They had no ropes, and almost in despair concealed themselves in a small rock shelter. Their dogs too felt the movement and barked in terror. Fortunately, the mountain did not rise more than a few feet and soon subsided, so that the men escaped. [525]

The attitude of the Bella Coola to supernatural powers of all kinds may be termed a doctrine of Opportunism. Supernatural beings abound and constantly play a part in the affairs of mortals. An alert and bold man can take advantage of these opportunities and obtain assistance, but he who hesitates is indeed lost. Certain types of assistance are most commonly granted to orphans and other unfortunates; accounts of these belong to the realm of mythology and will be described in a later chapter. On the whole the supernatural ones do not show discrimination in conferring boons, and the man who is quick to take advantage of them is the one to whom success comes. 776 [736]

Supernatural Elements in Human Beings

The Bella Coola believe that in the human body itself there are certain supernatural elements. Neither sticks nor stones can move, because they lack these attributes possessed by men and animals. Considering the firm belief of the Bella Coola in the omnipresence of the supernatural, it is not surprising that they should ascribe the phenomena of health and sickness, 774

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

nection of these with one another and with the spirit, the mental director of the life, is a matter of advanced Bella Coola theology on which opinions differ. Only men of philosophical temperament even hazard an opinion on such matters, which are beyond the realm of daily routine. 761

When a man dies, his life leaves his body and the useless flesh begins to decay. At the same time the life is freed to travel as an intangible wraith, having the form and appearance of its dead owner. It visits all the places where he had been in the habit of going during life, irrespective of their distance from the scene of death. Sometimes it journeys to the locality where, in a dream, the mother of the deceased received her first intimation of pregnancy (I, p. 615). It wants to see former friends and sometimes makes its presence known to them by whistling. A person who hears this sound is saddened by the realization that one of his associates has passed away in some distant place. At other times, a man merely senses its presence and feels frightened without hearing or seeing anything to account for it. Very rarely, a dead person's life speaks to a dearly loved friend to inform him of his loss. During the existence of the body, spirit and life are closely associated, and the former sometimes accompanies the latter on its round of farewell visits before ascending to Nasmît-a. 761 775 [774]

After four days the life descends to the land below where it lives forever as a ghost. Some believe that it is the shadow which assumes this form, but the seeming contradiction is relatively unimportant since the life is essentially shadow-like. Ghosts have already been described in connection with supernatural bodies, and further information will be found in vol. I, chap. VIII.

At death, when the life as a whole becomes a ghost, its constituent parts likewise undergo transformation. The one situated in the feet remains with the corpse and disintegrates; that located in the legs enters a wolf and nothing more is known of its fate; no one knows what happens to the one situated in the body. The part in the throat, including the voice, enters [827] [825] [534]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

961 an owl, possibly one of those which normally roost on the tree
775 behind Nuxmit-a. This element of a dead person occasionally 825 communicates with a living relative, as evidenced by the fol-[539] lowing story.
[827]

A number of years ago a party of men and women camped for the night beside one of the rivers flowing into South Bentinck Arm. After supper, as they were resting by their fire, an owl kept hooting from a neighbouring tree. One of the men turned to a friend who had been making obscene remarks and, half in jest, warned him to be careful in case one of his relatives was listening. The foolish fellow looked at the owl and asked:

"Are you a relative of mine?"

There was no answer, but when he had repeated the question four times, the owl spoke:

"I am so-and-so," he said, naming the deceased grandfather of his questioner.

Consequent upon the belief that the voice of a dead person enters an owl, the bird is treated with considerable respect. It is improper to make fun of one, or to ask who it was when alive. Should a person do so, the owl answers with the interrogator's own name and he soon dies.

961 On the whole, the life does not affect the daily existence of the Bella Coola as profoundly as does the spirit. When they stop to ponder on the reason for some event, they readily admit the importance of the life with its constituent elements, but they are not always considering its activities and seeking to strengthen it. It is essentially a religious attribute, of greater moment to a man of imaginative and suggestible temperament than to one who carries on the daily routine without asking why and wherefore.

THE TALLY POST

773 In the beginning of time, when Alqantēn sent the first 777 people down to earth, he erected in Nuxmit-a posts emblazoned with the bird or animal crest taken by each to serve as a memorial, or reminder, to him of the number of individuals existing sary to understand the attitude of the Bella Coola to the sexual act itself. Although it is a normal part of life (for no one would voluntarily abstain from all contact) yet the union of man and woman does not lack import, since its very humanness distinguishes those who practise it in the eyes of supernatural beings, both anthropomorphic and zoomorphic. Those who indulge excessively become so over-charged with this characteristic that their undertakings are certain to fail, whereas those who remain continent for a considerable period are so freed from the contagion of mankind that they become almost supernatural themselves and always succeed in their ventures. If, after a period of restraint, a man holds intercourse, this essentially human act adds typical human strength to that accumulated by chastity. Chastity alone gives power; but chastity consummated by intercourse at the proper period increases that power enormously. This somewhat complicated [184] belief is accepted without question by every Bella Coola, playing an important part in their lives, even in their present degraded condition. The following story illustrates the point rather clearly:

A party of Kingcome Inlet people had been present at a ceremonial at Smith Inlet. While returning home, one canoe, containing a chief, his wife, and eighteen or twenty commoners, was caught by an unexpected south wind and driven on the rocky islet, Ewa-ahdzy, where the lighthouse now stands. The occupants managed to reach shore and to save their canoe. The islet was barren, but they made a rude shelter of boughs in which they lived while the storm continued. Every day the chief sent out the young men to hunt seals, and every day they returned empty-handed. The little food they had with them on landing was now exhausted and they were starving. One night, when they were almost famished, the chief said to his wife:

"The youths have done their best. Now that death is before us I want to create a kindly feeling. I am going out, probably to die during the night, and I want you to allow each young man to sleep with you. [187] It is a strange request but our condition is unusual, and the story of your shame will never be known, because we shall soon all be dead."

The wife acquiesced. The chief then told one of the young commoners to lie with her, and afterwards to tell a comrade to do likewise,

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 who, in turn, would pass on the request so that it might reach each 831 member of the party. Not only is it contrary to custom for a commoner 785 to hold intercourse with a chief's wife, but it is unknown for a man to ask another to sleep with his wife, so the youth was surprised and rather [837] frightened. However, he acceded to the request, passed on the instructions, and washed. As he was bathing, a seal appeared in the surf beside [622] him, and he was able to kill it easily. Each in turn behaved in the same manner, washed, and then killed a seal. Next morning, when the chief returned he was delighted that all had turned out in accordance with his hopes. At the same time the wind dropped so that the party was able to return home.

831 The power which had brought the seals within reach of the 785 men had been engendered in their own bodies by these ritual acts after a rather lengthy period of continence. The Bella Coola believe that such a procedure always increases their strength and ability, therefore giving them a better chance to gain favour from supernatural beings, and to take advantage of opportunities offered. Hunters in particular are careful with [224] regard to their marital life since animals know their acts and [825] thoughts, and hide from one who has not made himself "clean" [785] by continence, its termination, and bathing. Sxetsta consists of these three elements, but since continence is the most prominent feature, the term may be translated as "ceremonial chastity."

In its simplest form this comprises merely the three elements already mentioned. The longer the continence, the greater the power engendered by its termination. A man who has practised abstinence for a year has such strength within himself that almost any good fortune may occur, and cases are known in which it has been carried out for even longer periods. More often, an individual practises ceremonial chas-[184] tity in accordance with a family tradition. One old man gave the following recipe and was most emphatic that it always 224 brought success in hunting and fishing; he added that on the 785 two occasions he had tried it, he had brought back a phenomenal number of skins.

A person planning to set out on an expedition for any pur-

614 extinct, are unusual; normally, the group is largely centred in one village, but with members scattered in other localities.
621. There is no central organization. It is generally recognized that such a unit belongs in the village where its first ancestors settled, and the leading chief of that village is, therefore, an important person in the family, though without status of [622] "head" of it. His advice may be appealed to in cases of dis-[553] putes concerning names, but he lacks judicial authority. Theoretically, the descendants of the elder of two first people are considered as "elder brothers and elder sisters" of those descended from a younger brother or sister; but this is nothing more than an accepted fact; it plays no part in the social life of the community.

552 In addition to human names, the origin myths include those 614 applied to dogs. The first ancestral group had dogs, and these 773 animals had names, or were given them by their powerful masters. Ever since that time their descendants can apply these designations to their own dogs. It is unnecessary to validate such names, but no two canines can be given the same one at the same time, according to the rule which governs the bestowal of human names. This matter was not investigated in detail, and the only dog's name collected was one for which [539] the origin myth is as follows:

When Tăl-ie was first settled in the beginning of time, the houses were built in parallel rows, one above the other, up the side of a steep knoll. At the very top was a toilet-house, built over such a steep incline [514] that excrement rolled down the hillside. In consequence, one of the early chiefs living there gave to his dog the name, Nulipemutl di mnk', "Rolling excrement," which has since been preserved in the ancestral family of his descendants.

LAND

124 Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining information 423 about land tenure. The Bella Coola resent keenly the way in which their land has been occupied by white settlers without, 177 according to their standpoint, proper compensation. Ques-

presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the sisaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqwal for his name Sinxälotla which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tlaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuxetl (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Tlaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

> Once,[9] long, long ago, Älquntäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sinxan·a, and a mortal; so he sent the young woman down to Stuix. She brought with her a small ring and told the people that her father had commanded her to marry the first mortal who succeeded in casting a stone through it. Sinxan·a was so lovely that all the young chiefs hastened to try their skill, but not one of them could succeed. At that time there was living at Stuix a poor orphan Bo'ostom, who had been brought up by his grandmother. Like all other young men, he admired the beautiful maiden and determined to try his skill. Bo'ostom asked his grandmother to wash and paint him preparatory to entering the contest. She was most unwilling, thinking that where chiefs had failed, there would be no hope for her grandson, but at length a friend persuaded her to give the lad a chance, and she painted his face as he had requested.

Bo'ostom took two pebbles of suitable size from the river and smeared them with colour. He told the first stone to go through the air and graze the ring, and the second to pass through it. The haughty young chiefs who had failed were amused at the idea of Bo'ostom even entering the competition, and asked him how such a lowly individual as he could aspire to the beautiful Sinxan·a. Paying no heed to his mockers, Bo'ostom again whispered his instructions to the first stone and threw it. Obedient to his instructions, the pebble grazed the ring, and once more the chorus of jeers burst out:

"Ha! Ha! What else did you expect, Bo'ostom?"

Nothing daunted, Bo'ostom told the second stone to pass through the ring. It did so, to the amazement and chagrin of the young chiefs.

Bo'ostom and Sinxan·a were married in due course. With his wife's help, the poor orphan became prosperous and built a fine house for himself. After a few months his wife became pregnant, and with phenomenal rapidity gave birth to a male child. The infant grew faster than a mortal, and in a few months had become a sturdy little boy. One day he asked his father to make him a bow and arrows, which Bo'ostom did. He gave his son a large number of arrows, but the latter said that he would want many more. As his father watched, the boy shot one arrow after another into the air, but not one fell back to earth The lad asked for more arrows, which Bo'ostom gave him after some hesitation, and these too disappeared into the sky. At length the father saw above him what appeared to be a thin rod stretching down from above; it came lower and lower until he could see that it was formed by the arrows, each one lodging in the butt of its predecessor. In response to his son's requests, Bo'ostom made more and more arrows until the rod reached the earth.

The boy told his father that the topmost arrow was embedded in the floor of Sang" and that he proposed to use the chain of shafts as a ladder

539 to climb up to visit his grandfather. Bo'ostom did not discourage him, so his son began the ascent and soon disappeared from sight. In course of time he reached the land above and made his way to his grandfather, Älquntäm, who was delighted to see him. He told his visitor that he was weary of constantly carrying the sun's light, and asked him to relieve [821] him of the duty for a time. He mentioned that on previous occasions when his wife had acted as his substitute, she, being a woman, had been shy and had hidden herself behind clouds. The boy was willing to undertake the task and listened to his grandfather's instructions; in the morning he was to use only one fire stick, a little later, two, then three, and, finally, four at midday. In the afternoon he was to decrease the number in a manner corresponding to the morning's increase.[10]

Next day Älquntäm went away for a holiday after entrusting his grandson with the precious fire sticks. As soon as he was alone, the malicious youth began to pile one after another on the fire, until people in the world far below were wakened at dawn by the suffocating warmth. Bo'ostom's son threw on log after log, each increasing the heat below. The earth began to sizzle, and finally burst into flames, and the water boiled in the rivers and ocean. Sunxan·a had realized what must be the matter as soon as she felt the great heat, so she went outside and rubbed her hand over the planks on her house. Thus protected, those within survived, although all other human beings perished. Most of the animals [825] escaped by hiding, though the weasel failed to conceal the tip of its tail which was burnt black, a characteristic inherited by all weasels ever since. Älquntäm felt the heat and hurried home.

"You have done great harm to mortals," he burst out angrily. "Hence- [825] forth you shall live on earth as a mink."

Älquntäm seized his grandson and cast him to earth in this guise.

539 The survivors of the catastrophe multiplied until the whole world was repopulated from the single household. Each of them took an a'alk 551 name from the burning, and these have been transmitted from one to 575 another of the descendants of each until this day. One of these, a nusqwal name, is Stalqalosam, "The Increase of the Sun's Heat through the Addition of Fire Sticks"; another, a llaiyäkam, uxnukwnalsaix, "The Track of the Sun"; a third, Skuul, "The Charred Portion of a Half-Consumed Log."

539 The following Kimsquit story[11] describes the obtaining of 575 an a'alk prerogative in the distant past.

Long ago, there lived in Kimsquit a young chief who was a great hunter. On one occasion, he was camping in a cave, Anokokwläls, on the mountains when not only its roof, but the dome of the sky as well, opened so that he was able to gaze into the upper regions of space. From this manifestation of the supernatural, he took for himself the name Älkwi, "The Opening of the Upper Regions," and validated it by giving valuable presents. This name has been transmitted from generation to generation and was recently brought to the present owner by his wife. With it is the prerogative of distributing potlatch gifts outside the house since the first Älkwi claimed that the sky itself was his only ceiling.

A few years after Älkwi had had this experience, he and his three brothers left Kimsquit by canoe to hunt mountain goats at Suxwälk. To their surprise, a gull perched on the bow of their canoe; they did not scare it away, thinking it indicated a manifestation of the supernatural. At intervals it left its perch and circled around the canoe, but soon returned. As they neared the landing-place, the gull flew ashore and changed into a yearling mountain goat. Älkwi told his brothers, of whom the second was named Älkexa and the third O'miätl, that he believed this to be a further visitation of the supernatural to himself and that he would investigate it, and later meet them at Anokokwläls.

Älkwi leapt ashore and followed the yearling goat. Wherever the road was rough, his strange guide travelled slowly so that his human companion could follow him. At length they came to a deep chasm with sheer walls about six feet apart, and a ledge running along one side. Älkwi followed the goat along this, until the animal leapt across the gorge, struck the face of the precipitous rock, and vanished. It was clear that he had passed into the interior of the mountain and the chief could hear the distant sound of a drum.

"I can die but once," he said to himself.

Then the brave hunter leapt across the chasm, struck the rock, and passed through it as if it had been tissue paper, to find himself in a vast cavern amid a large number of people. These were really animals who had gathered to await the coming of his guide, the yearling goat. The latter told him not to be afraid, that henceforth he would be under the protection of all animals and would not come to harm, no matter how often he hunted. With breathless interest, Älkwi watched the performance of a nusqwal dance, for every yearling goat is a supernatural dancer of this type. The ceremony lasted throughout the night, and next morning he set out for Anokokwläls, not realizing that it was really a year since he had left his brothers.

Meanwhile, though the three brothers had almost despaired of their elder's safe return, they patiently remained at their post, and after a year were overjoyed to see smoke rising from Anokokwläls. They hurried

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Älkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Älkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anokokwläls was a good place for a ceremony because Älkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[11] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Älkwi danced [535] a nusqwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nusqwal dance.

In later years, Älkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that [551] by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest brother the name, Nustakwalämi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Älkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcopinätl, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcopinätl, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the sisaok, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[12] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural from ghosts, and for four days feeds them lavishly. On the fifth morning they proceed to the grave, accompanied by kinsmen of the deceased, and pound on the ground with sticks, asking the dead person whether or not he had been murdered, and if so, the name of the murderer. It is said that in former times the voice of the deceased could always be plainly heard giving the desired information. This ceremony has not been carried out for many years, and exact details are not known by any of the living Bella Coola. It seems clear that ventriloquism must have been employed, requiring active deception on the part of the shamans. 756 775 787 [198]

It was difficult to ascertain to what extent shamans believed in their own powers to understand the speech of ghosts. There is no doubt that the Bella Coola are easily influenced by suggestion, and if an individual is told that he has received help from a ghost, it is not difficult for him to believe that such has been the case. Further, his fellows are convinced of his powers, a circumstance which does not fail to affect him. It may be stated definitely that in many cases shamans have some confidence in their own powers, although they do not hesitate to use deception to increase their prestige. This point will be considered in greater detail in the following chapter.

ACCOUNTS OF EXPERIENCES WITH GHOSTS

Much of the information concerning ghosts is contained in stories which have been handed down for generations and which are regarded as historical records. Some of these must be deferred to the chapters on folk-lore and shamanism, but the following are sufficient to explain the source of many Bella Coola beliefs on this subject.[48] 539 775

A Rescue from Ghosts

Long, long ago, there lived a little girl who used to cry incessantly. One evening when she was disturbing the whole household by weeping, her father said angrily to her:

[48]These stories have been included at this point as specific illustrations of the type of legend upon which generalized beliefs depend.

"Keep quiet or the ghosts will come and carry you off."

Even this threat did not silence her; later on, all her companions went to bed, leaving her alone, crying, in the central part of the house. After a time her father noticed the child's sobs had grown fainter, though she seemed to be weeping in the same manner as before. He went out to investigate, found her place vacant, and, listening intently, realized that the sound came from below; the ghosts had come for her. He roused the household and called in all the men of the village to dig for the girl with sharpened spruce branches. Her crying was still audible and the diggers were directed by it; sometimes they seemed to be on the point of overtaking her, but always her ghost-captor eluded his pursuers by moving sideways through the ground instead of continuing his direct descent. At length the men gave up their task in despair, leaving the mourning father and mother to lament the former's rash remark which had brought the ghosts.

The parents of the girl consulted all the village shamans, one of whom formulated a scheme to rescue the victim. He told her relatives to remove alternate boards from the roof of the house, and to place on each remaining one a vessel filled with urine. He stationed a helper beside each vessel, ready to upset it when he gave the signal, and requested everyone else to leave the house. When these arrangements had been carried out, the shaman went alone to the cemetery, passed through the earth to the land of ghosts, and invited the wraiths to assemble in the house for a feast. They gladly accepted, and the hidden assistants watched them enter, one or two at a time, as if they had been human beings bidden to a ceremony. At last all had arrived except the principal chief, who was to sit in the central seat behind the fire. The feast could not proceed without him, so the ghosts sent a special messenger down below to summon him. It was this chief who had stolen the child, and the excitement of the watchers became intense as he entered, carrying concealed beneath his cloak the girl whose cries betrayed her presence to the hidden relatives. When all had taken their places, the shaman gave the previously arranged signal and his accomplices tipped the urine over the beings below. Wild confusion followed. The ghosts dashed to and fro, showing their anger and resentment by furious whistling and incoherent gurgling. At last they rushed from the house, abandoning the child. They could still be heard in the vicinity of the village, so the shaman directed the people to scatter urine all around the houses, which drove away the unwelcome visitors. The use of this deterrent was first learnt on this occasion.

The parents of the stolen child were overjoyed at her rescue, but it was soon apparent that their daughter had changed. She would not eat; in fact, she acted as if she could not see food placed before her. The next morning she rose early and was seen to eat the ashes of fish that had been burnt as torches; this proved conclusively that she was really dead. Thenceforth, instead of being given food in the usual way, her meals were thrown into the fire, from the ashes of which she received her nourishment. Ever since that time, the Bella Coola have recognized that food for the dead must be thrown on a fire.

An Attempt to Rescue a Dead Wife

Two or three hundred years after the first settlement of the earth, a brave Kimsquit man, Nu·skobluxmx, set out with his three sons to hunt seals. His wife was in an advanced state of pregnancy at the time, but her delivery was not expected for several weeks and her husband had no hesitation in leaving her. The hunters were absent for three full days and nights, and returned home soon after dusk on the fourth day, having had great success. When they landed at the beach they were surprised to see no lights in any of the houses except their own. Leaving two of his sons in the canoe, Nu·skobluxmx and the other lad cautiously approached the dwelling. As they drew near, they realized that the light which shone forth was green and unearthly, and that the smoke, too, was greenish instead of white. Looking through the door, Nu·skobluxmx saw his wife standing with bowed head dangling an infant in a cradle suspended from a cord. This is a common method of soothing a child, but Nu·skobluxmx was horrified to see that the cradle had been fastened to the cord upside down so that the infant was hanging head downwards, with no visible fastening to prevent it from falling to the floor.

"Look out! The child will fall and be killed," Nu·skobluxmx called to his wife, but she did not seem to hear him.

The husband entered the house and touched her, but she crumbled to bones as he did so. The watching son cried out in fear and horror. Nu·skobluxmx hastily left the house and the two returned to the canoe, after ascertaining that no living people were in the village.

The four hunters slept that night in their canoe, and next morning Nu·skobluxmx prowled around until he found the villagers hiding in the forest not far away. They explained that, two days after his departure, his wife had given birth to a child, but the after-birth had not come away and she had died. It was the first time that this had ever happened and the people had fled from the village in fear.

Nu·skobluxmx knew that the ghosts would dance to welcome his wife on the fourth day after her death, and he determined to attempt to rescue her at that time. On the evening of the second day, the fourth after her death, he and his three sons lurked in the vicinity of their house. Presently they heard the sound of drums, which they knew must herald the approach of ghosts, so they hid themselves on the roof of their own house in such positions that they could peer down within. In some unknown way the four had been granted the power to see ghosts, for they observed the entry of what looked like ordinary human beings, though in reality they were wraiths. These took their places like spectators at a ceremony, while several with beating sticks seated themselves behind the fire as singers. As they struck their batons on the floor, one of the ghosts began to dance in time to the music, and Nu·skobluxmx's wife came to life and watched. Two ghosts who were directing the ceremony called out, "i · · · · a · · · · i · · · · a · · ·," which are words in the language of the dead and serve to invite some supernatural being from above to one of their ceremonies. In answer to the call, there came a thump on the roof, marking the descent of the visitor. This gave the dead woman power to move and she began to dance around the fire. She had completed one circuit and was on her second when one of the ghosts called out:

"Take care! I feel as if living people were watching us."

Some of the ghosts at once left the house and searched the bushes near it.

"No," they said on their return, "No one is near."

Nu·skobluxmx's wife continued her dance, and as she was circling the fire for the third time, her husband whispered to his sons:

"As she goes round the fourth time we must jump down, catch her, and fly to our canoe."

When the woman was midway in her fourth circuit, the four leapt into the house and Nu·skobluxmx clutched his wife in his arms, but she crumbled to bones at his touch and the ghosts rushed away, whistling angrily, leaving the four alone, Nu·skobluxmx holding the skeleton of his wife. Then they went and joined the other inhabitants of the village in their hiding-place. Everyone was anxious to hear the outcome of the attempt, though some did not believe the story. Nu·skobluxmx made no further effort to rescue his wife, knowing that it would be hopeless after the fourth day when the ghosts had welcomed her as one of themselves.

An Inadvertent Visit to the Land of Ghosts

A few years after the first settlement of the earth, four Kimsquit men went into the mountains to hunt goats. The first night of their absence, before they had killed any game, they lay down to sleep in a cave. Nothing disturbed their rest, but when they awoke in the morning they were amazed to find themselves in a strange country. They were near a wooded valley through which flowed a river resembling the Dean, but instead of the sun, there was shining in the sky a sphere that gave forth a green, sickly light. Unknown to them, the cave in which they had been sleeping had turned over on itself and projected them into the land of ghosts. The four brothers descended into the valley and walked up the bank of the river until they saw a large village on the other bank. It seemed to contain countless inhabitants who were amusing themselves by rolling to and fro with their feet a large, round object like a football. This led the four travellers to think they must be in the land of ghosts, though they were puzzled to know how they had reached it. They called across to the players, but though the river was narrow and though they shouted loudly and repeatedly, they received no answer. The reason for this, as they later discovered, was that the language of ghosts differs from that of human beings, and neither can hear the speech of the other. After a considerable interval, the third brother, who was sleepy, happened to yawn noisily; all the ghosts heard this sound and stopped their play to see whence it had come. They saw the four at once and called to them that they would send a canoe to bring them across the river. Two of the ghosts manned a large, skin canoe and poled it across, but as the bow touched the bank where they were standing, the oldest brother pointed out to his fellows that it was transparent. They all looked down into it and could see sticks and stones on the bottom of the river through the floor of the craft. They were somewhat nervous about trusting themselves in such a canoe, but the oldest shut his eyes and jumped aboard without mishap, followed by the other three. They soon landed on the beach in front of the village, but before any one of the four could set foot on the ground the ghosts who had come crowding around picked them up in their arms. Each was tossed by his holder to another further inland, and in this way they were gently thrown from hand to hand until deposited within the house of the chief, without using their feet and without a single ghost having had to move from the spot where he had been standing.

The four human beings found themselves in a large house crowded with what seemed to be people, but what they knew must be ghosts. At that distant period, men were wiser than they are today, and the brothers realized that the chief must be Ałłăi-iaiał himself. Ghost-heralds brought food to the four strangers, but they concealed it beneath their capes instead of eating it, remembering what they had heard at Kimsquit that a person who eats the food of the dead can never leave their home. The chief was kind to them and somewhat facetiously told them that they would come to harm if they stayed in a country where the people played as much as they did in his. He added that they could return to earth by the same route by which they had come, and advised them to

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

539 775 hurry back. After as short a visit as they thought polite, they asked to be ferried back across the river and retraced their steps to the cave where they had slept the previous night. It was dusk by this time and they lay down to sleep. During the night the cave rotated on itself once more, and in the morning they were delighted to find themselves in the mountains above the Dean River.

This was the first time that anyone had penetrated to the land of ghosts, and the friends of the four brothers were intensely interested in the account of their experiences. It was October at the time, but they explained that it was late winter in the land below. No one knows why or how the four brothers had received the power to pass into the land of ghosts, although it is assumed that Ăłquntłm must have granted them the boon.

A Kitlobe Story of a Descent to the Land of Ghosts

177 539 775 The following story was related by an elderly man who had heard it about ten years previously from three Christian Kitlobe who had been his fellow-passengers on a steamship between Vancouver and Bella Coola. It is not a Bella Coola story, although it has been circulated among members of the tribe as an interesting tale. The facts recorded in it do not agree entirely with their beliefs, but that is a matter of no [829] consequence to the Bella Coola who, having their own knowledge, consider it quite natural that the other tribes should have other concepts.

539 775 About one year before the story was told, a Kitlobe woman had died, leaving her husband and one grown-up daughter to mourn her. The husband refused to be comforted, and used to fall into a paroxysm of weeping whenever he saw any of his wife's clothing or goods. About a week after her funeral he took her clothing to the cemetery intending to burn it, but instead sat down on the ground to weep. Presently he noticed a passage beside him, down which he crawled until he came to a flat, rich land more prosperous than this world, where he wandered along aimlessly till he heard the sound of singing and hid himself behind a clump of bushes. There seemed to be five or six groups of people in different sections of the country, and the song was taken up in succession by each group. When he had remained in his hiding-place for some time, two people in new, white clothes passed so close to him that he could hear the rustling of their garments. He recognized one of the passers-by as his wife, and the other as a fellow-villager who had died some time previously. Somewhat perturbed at finding his wife apparently on friendly terms with a male ghost, the husband decided to return home and ponder before taking any rash steps.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 775

He crawled back along the passage to the cemetery and at once burnt his wife's clothing. When he reached home his daughter, who had been worried at his long absence, saw that her father had been weeping and tried to console him. He told her rather brusquely not to interrupt; and, while eating, recounted what he had seen that day, stating his determination to return in the morning and bring back his dead wife. His daughter begged him not to do so, reminding him that her mother had died of her own volition and that it would be dangerous to bring her back to earth; but the grieving father paid no attention to her appeal.

Next morning the man went again to the cemetery, where he found the passage still open. He went down, hid in the same thicket, and heard the same singing taken up by group after group. As on the previous day, after a considerable period of waiting, his wife passed by in company with the same male ghost. The husband rushed forth, seized her and shoved away her companion, who ran off discomfited. The woman offered no resistance, and her husband told her that he was going to take her back home again. The two returned to the passage, the man guided his dead wife through it to the cemetery, and thence they set out for their house.

Meanwhile the daughter, dreading what might transpire, had remained within. As her father opened the door, she cowered at the side of the house and saw that his hand was held out as if he were leading someone, though only one figure was visible to her. Her fear increased when she heard lighter footsteps accompanying his, and the rustling of clothing. She heard her father tell his wife, whom he addressed by name, that he would leave her in the main part of the house for a moment while he arranged the bedroom; he set about this, but though the daughter eagerly looked for her mother, she was invisible. When the father returned, he led his wife to the bedroom, but to the daughter it seemed as if he had put out his arm to guide nothing more tangible than air. The frightened girl could hear her father asking questions and giving answers as if in conversation, but her mother's voice was inaudible. The daughter heard her father ask his wife how she liked the land below and, judging from his later comments, concluded that she had said it was preferable to the land of the living except for the scarcity of food. The mother must have added that for this reason ghosts visit the houses of

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 775 human beings, knock crumbs to the ground with minute hooks, and punish by beating with the same barbs anyone who offends them by picking up such morsels. The girl heard her father say that in future he would be more careful to throw fragments of food on the fire, since he now knew that these were not only desired by the dead, but were necessary to them. Her mother must have asked whether they had eaten all the dried salmon, for her father answered:

"No. We have been so grief-stricken at your death that we have eaten hardly anything."

After a pause the girl heard her father say "All right," and judged that her mother had said she would go to get some. In a moment the door opened, though no one appeared, and the thoroughly awed girl heard the sound of light footsteps. She saw the ropes with which the box was bound unloosened without visible agent, and the salmon piled in a neat heap on the floor, then the bundle seemed to rise of its own accord and pass out through the front-door without human aid. After an interval the father appeared and asked his daughter where her mother had gone. The frightened girl told what she had seen, and both were amazed and puzzled. At last it dawned on the grieving husband that his wife must have stolen the food for the benefit of her friends below and had returned to her new home.

The husband, now twice bereaved, was filled with woe at this second loss, which was unexpected as his wife had said nothing of her intention of leaving. After deliberating for several days, he descended again to the land of ghosts, heedless of his daughter's appeals. He concealed himself in the same spot as before, and soon heard singing; but this time the words and tune were different and he listened intently. To his horror, the theme was of the ingenuity of a dead woman who had revisited her home, deceived her husband, and brought away a supply of dried salmon for the use of the ghosts. He recognized that the song must refer to his own wife and, grieved and humiliated, he returned home forthwith. He warned his daughter to say nothing of what had occurred and she obeyed his instructions, not wishing their shame to become known. A few days later, however, a number of friends gathered to console the husband; he became intoxicated, told the guests his adventures, and taught them the songs used by the dead.

A Carrier Story of an Ascent to the Land of the Dead

177 539 The following, like the last, is not a Bella Coola story. It is one known to a number of Kimsquit and deserves inclusion among Bella Coola tales if only for the reason that stories of foreign origin, when told sufficiently often, tend to be considered indigenous and the facts recorded in them accepted and incorporated into Bella Coola belief. This factor is undoubtedly responsible for many conflicting elements in their theology. The following story has every indication of Christian influence but is not less interesting on that account, as illustrating the process of assimilating new ideas into mythology.

About 1870, Māmaiyu,[a] a Xuxais Indian from Ootsa Lake, and his brother were trapping beaver in one of the lakes of the interior. They were both good hunters and every morning killed at least one of the animals. Māmaiyu was a strong, apparently healthy man, but one morning he fell dead. His grief-stricken brother was puzzled to know what to do with the body. It was winter, and the heavy snow and frozen earth made interment impossible, while lack of fire-wood made cremation out of the question, so he merely tied up the corpse to await better weather. Meanwhile Māmaiyu had gone aloft, where he saw a huge house containing many rooms. He went to the first of these, where a man was sitting with a huge book before him.

"What do you want?" asked the man.

Māmaiyu did not answer and his questioner continued:

"Your name is not here. Why did you come?"

This happened in one room after another, for Māmaiyu tried them all. Finally, at the end of the house, he came to the seat of the chief, who said to him:

"You have made a mistake. The time for you has not yet come. If you want to stay, you can do so by drinking this."

He showed Māmaiyu a glass containing a green liquid.

"If not," continued the chief, "you must drink this," and he showed him another glass filled with a white liquid.

Throughout this speech Māmaiyu had heard a strange rumbling and wondered what could be its cause. Happening to glance out through a window at the rear of the house, he saw a huge, metal ball, constantly revolving and giving forth the rumbling sound as it did so. From within [a] This story was related by Jim Pollard, an elderly Kimsquit, who stated that as a young man he had known Māmaiyu, who was about fifty years older than he. This tale is interesting as showing the manner in which a miraculous account can become accepted as fact within a short space of time. Māmaiyu must have been a man of imaginative temperament who was convinced that he had experienced incidents told to him by some white man.

came wailing voices and at intervals an agonized face appeared at one of the many small openings in the surface of the sphere. The supreme being, for the chief was none other, told him that those within the ball were evil persons, those who had committed theft or murder during life. Mâmaiyu, though innocent of these crimes, decided that he would be safer on earth and asked for the glass with the white liquid, which he hastily drained. The supreme deity inquired what present he would like as token of the visit, and he requested a beaver-axe, that is, one with a crooked handle such as beaver use.[a]

At the moment when Mâmaiyu drank the white liquid, his brother saw his body move very slightly. He hastily warmed some mountain goat grease and with this rubbed his face and mouth. At first he was unable to speak, owing to his muscles having become rigid from the cold, but they loosened gradually so that he was able to recount his experiences. Mâmaiyu's axe, being of supernatural origin, was invisible to all human beings, but this did not affect its potency, and from that time onwards the owner could catch beaver as easily as other men could catch salmon.

The information contained in this story does not correspond at all with Bella Coola beliefs concerning the fate of the dead. They tell it, and assume that such experiences are normal for dead Xuxais, though unknown to their own people.

[a]The Bella Coola know that beaver must have axes of this kind to accomplish their work, although white people, deceived by the invisibility of these, believe the animals use their teeth. Mâmaiyu received an axe of this type.

[756] (7) Dreams, especially those in which supernatural apparitions visit the sleeper.

Sterile Apparitions [1]

•539 The most common sterile apparitions are those of a stone
* 787 giving birth to a smaller stone, a tree falling almost to earth, then righting itself, or the sight of some enormous monster. Such an experience may come to anyone, and no one can tell what it may portend. The following examples will illustrate this kind of phenomenon. In accordance with Bella Coola usage, these are recorded as if actual facts.

Between 1890 and 1900 a number of men were paddling home to Bella Coola one fine October day when, as they were passing beneath some precipitous rocks to the west of Kwatna Inlet, they saw a giant, as big as a medium-sized tree, come leaping down into the sea. They could not see his face, which was turned in the opposite direction, but as he sprang they noticed that his hands were shaking like a dancer's. He struck the water with a tremendous splash, hurling the spray a distance of a hundred yards, and nearly swamping the canoe.
[776] They realized that the being must be a snusx, since it is well known that these creatures migrate to the mountain lakes for the summer and return to the ocean in the autumn.

Since there is a tendency for supernatural apparitions to appear in close succession, the paddlers were little surprised next day, as they passed near some flat rocks where seals were wont to sun themselves, to see a number of these animals come hurtling down from among the trees on the slope of a near-by mountain. The last to appear was as big as a grizzly bear. Undoubtedly the creatures were supernatural beasts that had assumed the form of seals. It had been a fine, clear day, but as soon as they had taken to the water such a severe storm arose that the canoe was almost engulfed.

[1] [i.e. - appearances of supernatural beings from which neither good nor bad results follow. - See cat. 116, p 517 - ANALYST]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

On the following day another adventure befell the same party when they were almost home. Passing the site of the present cannery, on the south side of North Bentinck Arm, about half a mile from its head, they went among some old stumps which at high tide resembled basking seals. When in the midst of these, they all seemed to come to life, crashing into the water in all directions, raising billows which drenched the paddlers with foam and nearly wrecked the canoe. The travellers considered themselves fortunate in reaching Bella Coola alive.

Apparitions have appeared several times near Mesatche Nose, the point between South Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel, a place noted for storms. On one occasion the father of a Bella Coola, in 1922, sixty years of age, was near there when he suddenly saw lights on two mountains diagonally opposite each other on either side of the fiord, at a distance of about six miles. The lights grew bigger and bigger, approached each other and receded, until finally they merged; it became bright as day, although it was midnight at the time, and there was only a new moon. The lights separated after a little, until each gradually withdrew to its mountain and disappeared.

Near the same spot some travellers once saw an enormous mountain goat walking on the surface of the water. Almost immediately a storm arose which swamped the canoe, and drowned all but one of its occupants. As soon as the craft was submerged, the gale subsided, as is always the case after people have been drowned.

During 1924, while a young Bella Coola was proceeding down South Bentinck Arm in his motor-boat, a storm arose and the waves poured into his boat until it almost foundered. In the midst of the gale he saw two pillars of water shoot up from the surface of the fiord to a great height, then gradually fade away as if they had been smoke. The storm ultimately subsided. No one could tell which supernatural being had

NEA Bellacoola NEA

787 thus manifested itself. A white man's explanation would be that the "apparition" consisted of two water-spouts.

● 539 On another occasion several Bella Coola were encamped on the shore of one of the bays of King Island opening from Labouchere Channel. As they lay dozing by the fire they became aware that a woman dressed in black was sitting near them, but closer to the flames than a mortal could have set. She explained that she had been gathering mussels and was warming herself; then, rising, she walked into the sea and disappeared. She was one of the ocean dwellers of whom little is now known though formerly they were more often visible. Another time one of the same folk was plainly seen sitting on a rock, but as her observers blinked their eyes she vanished.

[792] Dwellers in the underwater world are to be found beneath the lakes of the interior as well as under the ocean. Not many years ago, when some men were carrying goat meat down from their hunting ground, they stopped beside the small lake which lies at the head of the creek Swapé·s', which enters the Bella Coola River about eight miles from the sea.

"I wonder what lives in that lake," one man said idly to a companion.

"Nothing," the other replied, but the first responded:

"You are wrong. Something evil lives there."

He had barely finished speaking when there rose from the lake a man with long hair, who stood, swaying back and forth, with the water around his thighs.

"There you are," said the first speaker to his doubting comrade, "I knew something lived yonder."

After a few minutes the man sank back under the water. Forthwith a strong wind began to blow, and snow not only fell from the heavens but rose from the lake. The hunters, who were not clothed for wintry weather, had great difficulty in getting back to the valley.

Occasionally the works of underwater people have been seen. The father of a man here about 1880 was paddling to Kwatna Inlet one night when he, as well as the other occupants of the canoe, heard a roaring noise and saw a fish-weir, similar to those used by the Bella Coola, stretching across Burke Channel, which is about a mile and a half wide at this point. They went close to the beach and a brave man cut a passage through the obstacle. A similar trap was once seen stretching across South Bentinck Arm. 787 * 539 ●

An unusual apparition may be regarded as an omen of death. For example, not many years ago a young half-breed saw a motor-boat moored to the bank of North Bentinck Arm with an eagle seated in the stern. He ran his own motor-boat towards it, but as he approached the eagle became a man. Thus as he drew still nearer, never taking his eyes off the other boat, it, with its occupant, sank beneath the water, without leaving as much as a ripple. On relating the incident to his father, the latter recognized it as an omen of death. Six months later the half-breed's sister died, thus confirming her father's prognostication. 787 * 768 [811]

Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate

Experiences such as have been cited in the last section are regarded as of possible, and not infrequent occurrence at the present time. On the other hand, supernatural aid granted to those in misfortune, though it is the theme of many stories, is not considered as likely to happen now. The Bella Coola believe the narratives to be chronicles of actual events, and base their conceptions of many supernatural beings on their characteristics as therein described. There is no ceremonial significance attached to any of these stories; they may be, and are told by anyone, frequently for entertainment. Unquestionably, there is a feeling that the moral brought out in each tale is of value in educating the young people, though this point is never emphasized. 787 * 538 [869]

Supernatural aid granted to an unfortunate person is normal unknowledge. Power so obtained cannot be transmitted by the recipient, although memory of the experience is 787 * [675] [535]

787 occasionally preserved as the theme of a nusesé dance. The term is also somewhat loosely applied to any instance of supernatural help. The reason for the receipt of power is often attributed to the strong supernatural elements of the favoured one, or to his having made himself agreeable to supernatural beings by the observance of ceremonial chastity or other propitiatory means. A few individuals assert that there is a tendency for supernatural aid to follow certain ancestral families, but such a belief is not general.

The following story is typical of the kind of assistance granted although no clear picture can be presented except through the native medium—a number of different tales, such as are given in the following chapter.

THE GOOD FORTUNE OF 'Yoûndji

Not long after the earth was first populated there were living at Ẉeiyai, near Nanca, two Bella Bella men, Ẉmo'sala and Ẉâlum, with their wives, relatives, and slaves. Ẉmo'sala's son, 'Yoûndji, fell a victim to the virulent disease, Ẉâsly, which causes the face of the sufferer to swell and his flesh to rot. When the case appeared hopeless, his father called his herald to tell the people to abandon Ẉeiyai, and to leave the dying youth alone. Accordingly they removed the planks from the houses, packed them on canoes with all the food and clothing from the village and went away, leaving the unfortunate 'Yoûndji alone in his misery. Only an old slave woman took pity on him; before she left she hid some glowing embers with frayed cedar-bark in a large clam-shell and told him where to find them.

'Yoûndji wept bitterly when his relatives departed, but presently he dried his tears and set about making the best of his position. He unearthed the clam-shell and blew the embers into a fire. Next he made a hammer with which he built a rude shelter. A diet of clams at first satisfied him, but before long he made a hook in hopes of catching some trout. He went up the river to a suitable spot, dropped in his baited hook and almost immediately felt a bite. He hauled up his line eagerly, but it was only a worthless bull-head. Angrily he pulled out the hook and threw the fish back into the water. Almost immediately there was a bite, again he drew up his line only to find as before that it was a bull-head, which he hurled back into the river. This happened twice more, until, discouraged at landing only four useless fish, he wrapped his head

in his cape and cried himself to sleep. The next day 'Yetxdji once more tried his luck fishing, but again only landed four bull-heads, and again cried himself to sleep. It was the same on the third day and the fourth, and in the evening the hungry and disconsolate youth wept for a long time, his head wrapped in his cape. 539 787

Presently he felt someone kick his foot and heard a voice saying, "Stop crying! Get up!"

When the startled 'Yetxdji opened his eyes there was no one in sight. Concluding that he must have been mistaken, he again covered his eyes and went to sleep. But he was aroused in the same way, once more without being able to see his visitor. This time before he lay down he made a tiny slit in his cape so that while he pretended to be asleep he was really watching through the eye-hole. Soon he saw approaching a beautiful woman whose hair was worn in long braids as was the fashion of Fort Rupert women. Eagerly 'Yetxdji threw back his cape, but at his first movement she vanished. There was nothing to do but hope that she would return, so he again lay down with the opening opposite his eye. Once more the woman drew near, but this time the youth did not move, even when she kicked him and repeated her command not to cry.

"I see you," he answered, "don't run away."

The strange woman sat down without demur.

"Why did you throw away my children?" she asked. "They showed kindly feeling towards you in allowing themselves to be caught, and yet you rejected them angrily. None the less I have seen your misery and have come to help you. First I shall cure you."

When she had done this the woman continued, "I am going to give you supernatural power; when you want anything, just think of me and it will appear. I give you the chief's name, Kaiaxdidz; when you give a potlatch you must carve me on the posts of your house. My name is Beaver."

Then the woman vanished. She was a beaver in human form, which all animals are able to assume at will, though few mortals have the ability to see them except as animals. [825]

'Yetxdji decided to test his newly received power by wishing for a house. He thought of Beaver, and forthwith there stood a fine house before him. By merely thinking of his benefactress he was soon able to fill it with goods, blankets, mats, boxes, benches, cooking utensils, and food of all kinds, and on the beach he soon had a flotilla of canoes. The size of the establishment proved the prosperity of its owner.

Meanwhile Xwa'xale and those with him were in dire straits for food. One day the old slave woman who had befriended 'Yetxdji happened to be foraging not far from Xwiyai when she saw smoke rising from the place,

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 * 787 She assumed it to be a forest fire, but, when she idly went near to investigate, her amazement was past all bounds at seeing a fine house filled with valuables. Nor was her surprise lessened when she discovered that 'Yeäxdji was lord of it all. He welcomed her gladly, gave her a hearty meal, and sent back with her some seal meat for her child, only adding that it was to be eaten secretly as he did not wish his father to know of his good fortune.

"But," he added, "I don't mind if you send me any of the people except my father, especially any who were good to me long ago."

The slave woman thankfully carried the meat home to her child. But he, long deprived of proper food, ate so ravenously that night that a lump stuck in his throat and his coughing awoke Qomo'sala. The chief pounded the youngster's back until he vomited what was obviously a piece of seal. The slave woman, remembering 'Yeäxdji's order, tried to evade her master's questions as to where her son had obtained it, but at last she blurted out the truth, how the abandoned youth had become prosperous.

The slave woman and her friends moved to Qwiyai, where 'Yeäxdji used his power of thought to obtain for them houses filled with everything they could desire. But Qomo'sala and those left with him were starving, so that they too were driven to seek his aid, gladly marrying their daughters to him in return for his protection. He rapidly rose to a position of importance, being the husband of both real and fictitious wives, and was even able to provide his elder brothers with mates. Some of the women married to him became almost his slaves, as their families were unable to rebuy them.

Supernatural Good Luck

777 * 787 A third manner in which the Bella Coola can come into contact with powers of another plane is through supernatural good luck. This consists in obtaining something from a supernatural being, usually a portion of its slain body, which acts [224] as a bait to fish, mammals, and even to such inanimate articles [226] as blankets or skins. Even a tiny morsel placed on a weir will attract numerous salmon, or if set on a trap will prove an infallible lure to animals. When put in the owner's box, valuables will be attracted to it as steel to a magnet. Thus the fortunate possessor will be able to give many potlatches and to reach a [492] high position in the community. Since this good fortune is

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

insane, a calamity unquestionably due to his recklessness in handling the earth where a supernatural one had trod. 777 787*

This point illustrates the danger of near approach to a mätsqus, a theme well exemplified in the stories in the next chapter. Such perils must be counteracted in diverse ways according to the traditions of different ancestral families. One common method is to seek a lonely spot in the woods and there hollow out a shelter beneath an overhanging rock or fallen tree-trunk where the person who has been exposed to danger must remain for four days, eating nothing and at intervals scrubbing his body with branches of devil's club, spruce, and other rough plants. These protect him from the evil effects of the monster. [761] 783 [824]

Similar in function to the mätsqus, and equally dangerous to the unwary, is the sisiutl. The latter is supposed to have been created on this earth, at Bella Bella, in the beginning of time by Yulätimut. It was at first the canoe made by this carpenter, and then turned loose by him to range the mountains and fiords, as it has ever since, equally at home on land and in water, and in various forms. The following is a typical description of the manner in which a sisiutl appeared in the past. 777 787* [773] [776] 539 777 787*

Long ago a man was hunting in the mountains when he saw a salmon, which changed in an instant to a fish-like monstrosity with two heads but no tail. He lunged at it with his stick, and in so doing started a slide which carried the salmon down the mountain. As this was taking place, the hunter said:

"Go down the mountain, salmon; I will get you at the bottom."

When he reached the foot of the new slide he saw the fish lying clear on the stones. He cut it up and slung it on a cedar-bark rope. Now this salmon was a sisiutl, the first that had ever been seen, and the hunter obtained supernatural good luck from his experience. He also took the name of Sisiutl, a designation which has been handed down until recently.

After this adventure many people hunted for the sisiutl, and with fair success in early days, but now it cannot be found, 777 787*

539 This is a supernatural bird about the size of a crow, with a broad hooked beak and blue-black iridescent plumage. Its note resembles that of a swan. The peculiarity of the bird is that its flesh and bones are of mountain goat grease; even its droppings are of this valuable substance, and it is these which are specially prized. Long ago ǫokǎn·i were comparatively common, but all have now fled beyond the range of the white man's rifle.

777
[776]

Wikwanutl knew what to do, so he crept stealthily up the mountain armed only with his hunting stick. Presently he saw a ǫokǎn·i feeding on a mountain goat which had been caught in one of his snares. It answered to the descriptions Wikwanutl had heard, and he could see that its droppings were like solidified mountain goat grease. The hunter crawled near, and took advantage of the instant when the bird was within the goat's stomach to leap forward and club it as it looked up. Wikwanutl twisted the neck until the head separated from the body and flung the former behind him, to the right, without noting where it went. This enables the bird to return since, like all other living creatures, when it seems to die it does no more than shed its cloak of flesh. Then the hunter cut the body into halves, threw the right portion in the same direction as the head, and carefully tied the left half in his cape of cedar-bark. Next he collected the droppings and wrapped them in evergreen boughs. Carefully carrying his treasures, he went down the mountain, and hid them in a niche cut in the trunk of a cedar tree, before he went home.

Next day, Wikwanutl did not hunt but returned to the place, drew out the piece of the bird's body, and dried it over a fire, as if he were toasting salmon for winter use. At night he went home, still refraining from telling anyone what he had done. For four days he cured the meat, then carefully closed the niche and went away.

For one year Wikwanutl did not hunt. Then he reopened the recess and saw that the meat was fresh and juicy, as if newly prepared. He left it in place, but drew forth the droppings and carried them off in a small bag. Fortune followed him. By using a small piece of the solidified grease on his traps he had wonderful success. At length Wikwanutl told his fellow-villagers what he had obtained and they were envious of his good luck. He continued to prosper, and at last sold the droppings for a large amount of goods, though he carefully preserved the section of the body itself. When an old man, he showed his son where it was concealed and the latter likewise prospered throughout his life, owing to this possession. When he became old, he in turn told his son about it, so that the young man had the same good fortune as his father and grandfather. But the great-grandson was too lazy to take the trouble of going with his father to the place where the section of the bird was hidden, so the treasure was lost. 777 787 *

A fourth giver of supernatural good fortune is one of the mythical creatures termed snusx̣. This variety lives in the ocean, or rarely in rivers, and can occasionally be seen resting on the surface with its long, golden tresses floating on the water. The hair appears always to be flecked with eagle down, but in reality it is a mass of barnacles, the equivalent of this substance to this under-sea dweller. If the observer is brave, he will paddle cautiously near until he can twist a lock of the hair around his paddle and break it off. He must not touch it with his hands, but must dangle it outside the canoe, still wrapped about his paddle, until he reaches the shore, when he must conceal it in some lonely place for one year. After that period he can use a single hair, or piece of one, as bait; it will be enough to attract animals to his traps or salmon to his weir, exactly as with the mountain goat grease excrement of a qokän·i or a stick that has come in contact with a giant toad. If the person who has jerked off the hair with his paddle should be foolish or ignorant enough to bring his spoil into his canoe, he, and all with him, are rendered incapable of movement and the craft with its occupants sinks beneath the sea. [539] [224] [776] [224] [226]

The father's cousin of an informant once saw one of these animals when paddling in company with several companions to Kimsquit. The sea was smooth as glass when their attention was attracted by a number of small ripples, spreading in a half-moon shape from what they realized was the head of a snusx̣. The hair crossed the ripples, but did not rise or fall with them. The back of the animal's head was nearest the canoe so the opportunity seemed favourable for obtaining some of its hair. Cautiously the men paddled nearer, but at the last moment the steersman feared to drive the canoe in among the golden tresses, so veered off and the craft passed along one side of the mass of hair. The animal had shown no sign of being aware of their presence, but it now began to turn away,

1! McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

777 so that its floating locks remained between them and its head.
* 787 As it turned, the hair moved with it, so that, although the impression remained of a floating mat, there must have been some motive power to cause it to remain streaming out straight behind. Each strand moved through the ripples without being affected. Though the paddlers strained to the utmost to see the animal's face it thwarted their efforts by this continuous slow turning, until at last they went on their way, disappointed.

● 539 Yet another creature from which supernatural good fortune
777 has been obtained is the Mother of Snakes, a creature described in the following story.

* 787 A family living at Nulkax was reduced to the point of starvation 226 through the failure of their salmon-weir. It seemed as if the fish avoided it. One day a son of one of the owners, who had been in trouble with a [776] woman in the lower valley, went off into the woods not far from his village, where he saw what he thought was a black bear. When it came nearer he realized that its chest was tipped with silver and that its tongue kept shooting far beyond its jaws; hence that it must be the Mother of Snakes. This creature combines the qualities of bear and snake; it is about the size of the former, and it appears to have a serpent wrapped around its chest. It always pursues mortals and slays them, unless they [784] know the proper means of escape. Luckily, the youth's father had long ago warned him what to do if chased by one, so he at once dashed off. First he ran downhill, but the animal gained on him; then he ran uphill, but still the monster drew nearer. The only way the fugitive could increase his lead was by ascending or descending in zigzags, since the brute's heavy legs then kept slipping. All day the pursuit continued, until towards dusk, when the youth was almost exhausted, he saw at last what he was looking for, a stump with splinters, projecting upwards. Pushing these apart with his hands, he leapt through the opening thus made, then circled the tree once sunwise, and pulled away one of the jagged spikes. Now the Mother of Snakes must always follow directly in the tracks of its quarry, and as it jumped through the passage the youth struck it across the back with the splinter which he had pulled out. Down fell the monster dead.

With his knife the lad cut off some of the animal's meat which he carried home, saying nothing to his father. Early the next morning the old man went to look at his salmon-weir, but as usual it was empty. As soon, however, as his son drew near, the river became packed with salmon, all heading towards the trap which was soon filled.

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"It seems as if you attracted the salmon like a magnet," said the father to his son. 777

The latter did not answer immediately, but later he said: 787 *

"You were right," and he told him what had happened. [539]

"You have obtained supernatural good luck," the old man replied simply. [226]

Following his son's instructions the father prepared canoes and boxes to bring back the flesh of the Mother of Snakes. They collected every scrap of it, which they preserved very carefully, and used small portions as bait to attract salmon to their weir with such success that they became wealthy.

Another supernatural being from whom supernatural good fortune may be obtained is Skwanät·än·a, "The Female Mourner." When a chief dies she comes to wail, wandering through the woods near the village, where sometimes she can be seen in the form of a weeping woman. As she cries, she ejects mucus from her nose, which solidifies into a glass-like substance about a foot in length. Anyone who sees her should take the transformed mucus, and wrap it in some article of his own clothing; it will bring him good fortune. About midnight of June 21, 1922, the infant daughter of a Bella Coola died, and about seven o'clock on the following morning the wailing was heard[1] in the woods behind the missionary's house. The brother of the dead child's father rushed off to try to find the weeping one. Luckily he did not succeed, because he did not know about collecting the mucus, and trouble would have come to him had he seen the supernatural being without knowing how to deal with it; in fact, even to hear Skwanät·än·a is considered an omen of death. [776] [776] [763]

It will be seen from the foregoing specific instances that supernatural good luck is usually obtained by the slaying of some powerful creature. But, since every living creature is endowed with superhuman power, it follows that any object obtained from a bird or an animal that has acted in a peculiar way may be the cause of supernatural good fortune if it be kept for one year in the manner previously described. Some- [825] [224] would be of enormous value, since the Bella Coola consider these ducks a great delicacy, and say that their flesh resembles that of seals. In fact, when an invitation to a seal feast is given the words used mean, "come to eat harlequin ducks." 756* [262] [223]

No attempt was made to collect all the shaman stories current in Bella Coola, but the subject is amply illustrated by those gathered, of which the following is representative. 756* 539

The Adventures of Waowal·is Long, long ago, there dwelt among the people who lived on the shore of Dean Channel and were partly Kimsquit, partly Bella Bella, a mighty shaman, Waowal·is. He was a married man with a son just learning to walk, and an adopted one about twelve years old . One day Waowal·is told the latter to fetch water, but the lad was lazy and made no motion to obey, so his foster father kicked him angrily. Whereat the boy cried out:

"What are you hurting me for? Why don't you kick your wife or your partner? They are always sleeping together when you are away."

Waowal·is apparently paid no attention to this, merely saying:

"Stop crying. I am sorry I kicked you so hard. Run along and get the water."

Waowal·is, who was a great hunter, began to get his canoe ready for a seal hunting trip, and told his adopted son to accompany him. The two set off within a few hours. Waowal·is owned a stick of which one end contained the power of causing death, and the other of restoring life; he had only to make the motions of throwing this stick at a living creature, death-dealing end foremost, and the one at which it was pointed fell dead. Many seals had been killed by this means when Waowal·is asked the boy:

"What was it you said when I kicked you?"

By this time the lad had regained his temper and was sorry he had disclosed what he knew.

"I said nothing," he answered, "but gave a shout of pain."

"You liar," Waowal·is calmly replied. "You said that my wife was sleeping with my partner."

The boy, realizing that all was known, answered truthfully:

"Yes, I did say that. I have often seen her doing so when you were absent."

It was late afternoon by this time and Waowal·is at once headed back to the village, which they reached soon after dark. No one saw their approach, so Waowal·is told the boy to stay with the canoe and the seals on the beach while he went to the town to investigate. He crawled cautiously to the outside of the house at the point where he knew his wife would be sleeping; there he scratched on the wall with his finger nail, making a noise like a mouse. He heard his wife say:

"I wish that mouse would eat Waowal·is's entrails."

This so angered him that he smote with the death-dealing end of his stick, killing everybody within. Then he went around to the front-door, entered, cut off the head of the false partner, and carried it away. Once outside the house, he made the motion of spearing with the life-giving end of his rod, thereby reviving all but the man he had beheaded. Then he went back to his canoe and returned to the sealing ground with his adopted son.

After a time the infant, asleep next its mother, was awakened by blood pouring over him, and cried so lustily that he woke his mother and grandmother. To the former's horror, she found her lover dead and beheaded. The grandmother asked what ailed the child and the mother replied that it had voided blood. She arose, washed the infant, and dragged out the headless corpse to another part of the house where her lover's parents lived; then went back to her own place and slept. Next morning, when the parents of the slain man had cooked breakfast, they sent a young son to waken his brother, but the boy returned saying that the latter was dead and headless. When this was confirmed, the whole household was plunged into grief and consternation, combined with fear and wonder as to who could have done the deed, because no one knew of Waowal·is's return. They buried the dead man the same day.

In the afternoon Waowal·is returned, waving his paddle above his head, apparently in the best of spirits. The people called out to him from the shore:

"We have bad news that will spoil your happiness, your partner has been murdered."

Waowal·is paid no attention, but continued to wave his paddle. He told his adopted son to stay in the canoe on the beach, and went by himself up to his house carrying a sack filled with seals, beneath which he had placed his partner's head. He told his wife that at the bottom there was a choice tid-bit from the stomach and she removed seal after seal searching for it, until she came to her lover's head with staring eyes and open mouth. When she screamed, Waowal·is took the head and banged it down on her naked body.

"You always wanted him," he said. "Here he is. Don't be afraid."

Then he fled to his canoe and sped away with his adopted son. A number of the people set off in pursuit, but whenever one of their canoes drew too near, Waowal·is loosened cloud-like smoke which concealed him.

At length the pursuers abandoned their efforts and Waowal·is went on, never to return.

Waowal·is and his son travelled far away, always seeking a place to settle, until one day they saw a large town on the beach, with smoke coming from only one of the houses. The two landed, and Waowal·is left the lad in the canoe on the beach while he went on to investigate. He could find no one in any of the houses, until at last he came to the one from which smoke emerged, in which he saw an old blind man cooking food and his beautiful daughter making cedar-bark mats. He entered quietly and sat beside the man without speaking. As the latter lifted some food from the pot and poured it on a dish, Waowal·is took it and hid it under his cloak. The old man felt for his food, then said to his daughter:

"I have lost the food that I have been cooking. Some one must have stolen it."

She did not look up as she laughed back:

"Nonsense! As you know, there is no one in the whole country but we two."

Again the old man poured out some of the food and again Waowal·is hid it, so once more he complained to his daughter. This time she looked up and saw the stranger.

"You are right," she said to her father. "A man is sitting beside you."

"What do you want?" she asked Waowal·is. "Whence have you come? Why have you stolen my father's food?"

He answered her last query.

"I was only playing, here it is," and took it from under his cape.

He had fallen in love with the girl and said to her father:

"Please let me marry your daughter."

"If you restore my sight you can have her," the father replied.

"I am a powerful man," Waowal·is laughed.

With that he took the old man's head between his hands and spat in his eyes, as he rubbed them with his hands; at once the sight was restored. The father kept his bargain and agreed to his daughter's marriage.

They asked Waowal·is if he were alone, and when he answered that his adopted son was in a canoe on the beach, they called the boy in and the four sat down to a meal. There was no water in the house and Waowal·is told the lad to fetch some, but at once the old man and his daughter stopped him.

"No, no," they said. "You can't get any here, there is an evil monster, a snusx, living in the water that sucks down whoever ventures near. It has killed all the other people of the village."

"I am stronger than any snusx," Waowal·is answered, and told the boy to take a bucket.

The lad set off with Waowal·is following. The latter took the precaution of tying a rope around the boy's waist, and holding one end. As he knelt down at the water's edge the snusx appeared; it seemed as if the water parted, to disclose its ugly mouth, and the youth was sucked in. Waowal·is made the motion of throwing his stick, death-end foremost. There was a tremendous commotion beneath the surface, and presently the dead monster floated up. The shaman drew his knife, slit the creature's throat, and drew out his son, still alive. By this time the old man and his daughter had come to the spot, thankful to witness the death of the dreaded foe. Within its stomach they found the remains of human victims, some corpses almost entire, others mutilated by the loss of an arm or a leg, and others nothing but bones. The two recognized many of them, and these Waowal·is restored with the life-giving end of his stick, eventually reviving all the people of the village. As was to be expected, they almost overwhelmed him with their gratitude. He married the girl he had chosen and in due time became a chief. Food was scanty, so Waowal·is frequently went hunting, returning with abundance of game, the skins of which his wife made into clothing.

For a year Waowal·is lived in the village without any event worth recording taking place, his only disappointment being that his wife had borne him no child. One day when his wife was washing clothes at the edge of the ocean a blackfish saw and desired her. He had the power of raising the water when he wished, so this he did, and engulfed the woman. A number of people saw the catastrophe and cried out to Waowal·is what had happened. Calling his son, he leapt into his canoe and set off in pursuit. For some distance he was able to follow the route taken by the blackfish, until the latter dived and did not reappear; Waowal·is decided to follow. He tied one end of a long rope to the canoe and proceeded to lower himself into the depths, telling his son to remain in the craft ready to hoist him up again on receipt of a signal.

Waowal·is went down through the water until he found himself in a land where everything was much the same as on this earth. A sun was shining there and he landed in a wooded valley through which flowed a river. He walked upstream a short distance, laboriously finding his way through fallen logs that lay everywhere, until presently he saw an old man in a canoe on the river; the man was slave to the chief who had carried off Waowal·is's wife, but, of course, the shaman did not know that. He wanted to talk to an inhabitant of the undersea land, and seeing that the man in the canoe was gathering firewood, he projected his willpower at him to cause him to land and begin work at a hollow tree wherein Waowal·is had concealed himself. The slave was using a stone wedge, and when this penetrated into the centre of the tree, Waowal·is broke its cutting edge, thereby terrifying the workman, who feared what his master might say at the ruin of a valuable tool. The slave drove in another, and again the shaman broke that, increasing the forebodings of the slave. Then Waowal·is appeared from within the hollow tree and offered to repair the broken wedges in return for assistance. The slave, only too glad to do anything that would save him from the wrath of his master, willingly answered when Waowal·is asked him whether he had seen any stranger in the land.

"Yes, my master returned yesterday with a very beautiful woman."

"That was my wife. Will you help me to recover her?" asked Waowal·is.

"Yes," the slave said.

Then Waowal·is instantly repaired the broken wedges. The slave suggested a possible plan for rescuing the woman.

"Every evening, just before nightfall," he said, "I carry firewood into the house, and then they send me out again for water. If you hide close to the door, you will be able to see where your wife is sitting when it is opened for me to bring in the fuel. When I return with the water I will pour it on the fire to extinguish it, and you may be able to rush in and seize your wife in the darkness and confusion."

This plan was adopted. Waowal·is helped the slave fill the canoe with firewood, and towards dusk they returned to the blackfish's house. Waowal·is hid himself within a hollow log which the slave set upright outside the house in such a position that he was able to see in through the front door. The slave carried in the rest of the firewood and the watching shaman saw his wife sitting near the fire. When sent out for water, the slave chose the largest bucket in the house and returned with it brimming full, then, as he passed the fire, he stumbled so that the liquid was thrown on the flames, extinguishing them. In dashed Waowal·is and seized his wife with a whispered:

"I am Waowal·is."

They fled out of the door, to the place where he had landed from the world above, and where the rope was still hanging down. He made the agreed signal for hoisting, but there came no answer from the lad who had been left in the canoe. Nothing dismayed, Waowal·is and his wife climbed up the rope to the canoe, where they found a skeleton, all that was left of his adopted son. To Waowal·is and his wife it seemed as if they had only been absent a little time; but they had been in the land of the

● 539 He had rotted to the bones, but Waowal·is used the life-giving end of his stick to revive him, and the three returned happily to the village.

In an almost identical second version of this story, collected from another informant, the community to which Waowal·is belongs is not mentioned and the boy is not an adopted son but a young slave. The adventures are the same even in details, except that before Waowal·is presents his wife with her lover's head he instructs the slave to remove the plugs from the beached canoes of his fellow-villagers. This does not seem to have deterred the latter, for Waowal·is was followed as in the foregoing tale and, as there, released his cloud mist in order to escape his pursuers.

Bc
* 756 It is not claimed that any recently deceased shamans had power equal to that of Waowal·is, although remarkable ability has been attributed to several living in the last century. The mother of one Bella Coola woman is believed to have been able to see the details of the sun and moon. She stated that on the latter were mountains and snow.

BB
756 Even more striking is the following account of a Bella
787 Bella shaman, who had visitations from supernatural beings during the last century. On one occasion, when performing a dance on the beach, he walked into a small hill; the spec-
Bc tators could hear his song continuing, and soon he emerged on
* 756 the other side, having passed through the obstacle. Later on, the same man was convicted of murder by a white judge and sentenced to death. His fellow tribesmen asked why he did not save himself and he replied that he would do so in his own time. The judge pardoned him and set him free, which was regarded as confirmation of his claim. His first vision had come to him when in the cemetery at Kwatna, but his most spectacular experience was when a slide descended and immersed him as he was paddling in his canoe on the ocean. For one day he remained under the slide, as well as under the water, then he reappeared and paddled on his way.

*756 783 841 jects have power over shamans. A shaman must never sleep beside his wife during her menses, must never eat food prepared by a menstruating woman, by one who has recently washed a new-born infant, by a girl during the period of seclusion following puberty, or by a widow or widower during the year that follows the death of his partner. If a shaman's nose bleeds when he is dancing it is because a menstruating woman is present in the house; he at once asks the offender to withdraw, after which the bleeding stops. Moreover, he must [755] never cure a woman during her periods. A wise shaman prac- [785] tises ceremonial chastity frequently. In view of the lack of cleanliness ascribed to menstrual blood, it is perhaps surprising that a woman can become a shaman while still of child-bearing age. This is rare, and only occurs when a woman is the last survivor of a family. The Bella Coola themselves consider it to be peculiar, only explicable on the ground that anything is possible to the supernatural beings, even the disregarding of feminine "uncleanness." Usually, female shamans are past the age of child-bearing; if not, they observe absolute chastity.

*756 761 Even inadvertent breaking of one of these rules causes death. This is not regarded as a punishment inflicted by Ṭhitcāplilān·a; it is merely the inevitable consequence of the supernatural power within the shaman having come in contact with what is not clean. As a shaman is considered to be immune against all ordinary ailments, his death is always attributed to the breaking of a taboo. Frequently the death of a shaman is accompanied by some convulsion of nature. One female shaman, for example, told the people of her village to keep their children within doors, since a supernatural being was coming for her. Soon it became dark; there were four loud claps of thunder, at the fourth of which she fell dead.

●539 *756 The following was related as an instance of the danger to a shaman of coming in contact with an unclean woman.

[783] [841] [787] The son of the first man to come to earth at Nulkax was, like his father, named Dudusoxʷ. One April he and his wife went upstream to Xwunlo, a place in the country of the Carriers where milk-weed is plen-

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

tiful, of which they planned to collect a supply. In the course of their journey *Dudusong*ʷ saw a man who, when he drew near, turned into a piece of hanging moss. A little later he again saw a figure, but on approaching it became a tree. *Dudusong*ʷ and his wife walked on and presently the former once more beheld a man; this time the apparition changed to a fir tree. It was evident to *Dudusong*ʷ that a supernatural being had manifested itself to him, and he told his wife that they must return. On reaching home he related his experience and gave a shaman's dance. 539 756* 787

From this experience he had received the power of curing. He could see disease when it was invisible to all others, and could summon it to himself, where it was harmless, thus restoring the patient to health. He made for himself a rattle, shaped like a bird; this had the ability of dancing of its own accord, and would catch people's hair in its opening and closing beak. The sick were brought to *Dudusong*ʷ from all over the valley. One day he travelled by canoe down to Sisaf where he found many of the villagers seriously ill. His arrival was quite fortuitous, for he was unaware of the epidemic that was raging. The inhabitants sought his help, so he landed and cured them. He entered the house of a woman who claimed to be ill, and took the sickness upon himself, but no sooner had he left than he fell down stricken. He demanded to be taken home in his canoe, but he only lived two days after his return. The woman had been in pain from her menses; it was this that he had taken upon himself and caused his death. 539 756* [761] [783] [841]

In consequence of the danger attached to the vocation, many people try to avoid becoming shamans, though if Ťlitcāplilān-a should appear to a man when ill, he cannot escape the power. The usual method of prevention is for a man to hold intercourse with his wife from below, so that her flesh, impure through its liability to menses, can form a barrier to the coming of supernatural power. One who wishes to escape always sleeps on the left of his wife, whereas if he is seeking shaman's power he sleeps on the right. Another method of avoidance is to use the hole in the floor which serves as exit and entrance to the house of a girl secluded following adolescence. 756* [787] [833] [513]

Since the power of a shaman is obtained by a personal experience, and lacks both form and substance, it cannot be transmitted and disappears at the owner's death. As has been bitterly regretted his own cowardice, for the wonderful cures stopped, whereas, had he accepted the supernatural guest, he would have been able to perform them. 756* 787

SHAMANS FROM THE DEAD

There remain to be described shamans from the dead, whose abilities and prerogatives are almost identical with those already described. They obtain their power either from the visitation of a ghost in this world, or by a journey to the land of shades below. The following incident explains why shamans alone can hold converse with ghosts. 756* 775 787

Once, long ago, the lover of a young girl died. She was so heart-broken that in her agony, four days after his burial, she lay down on his grave to weep. The dead man was able to visit her and in due time she gave birth to a child, who, like its father, was a ghost, with drawn face and glaring eyes. The perturbed woman tended it in the forest, her love overcoming a feeling of repulsion, and when she returned to her home she endeavoured to prevent her own mother handling the infant, knowing that she would be horrified. The grandmother insisted, but as soon as she saw the ghastly appearance of the child she dropped it in horror, and the infant vanished. [539]

Since then there has been a barrier, resembling a wall of smoke, between mortals and the dead. If the old woman had not dropped her grandchild, the living would still be able to converse with their deceased friends and relatives.

Nowadays, shamans alone are able to lift the barrier and discourse with the ghosts of those who have departed. These are quite common visitors to the land of the living, but only a shaman can understand their languages, of which one is a series of whistles, and the other resembles the attempts at speech made by a tongueless individual. Shamans can learn what the dead require and so transmit the knowledge to the relatives of the deceased. As, long ago, shamans whose powers were derived from animals were able to teach mortals the proper methods of hunting, and the taboos enjoined, so a [198]

* 756 775 787 shaman from the dead once visited the land of ghosts and learnt their needs. They informed him that food and clothing thrown on the ground did not reach them, and that in order to do so it must be cast on the fire. Instead of journeying to the land of the dead some shamans receive their powers from ghosts who ascend to this earth, as the following account describes.

● 539 * 756 775 787 [828] [155] Within the lifetime of an elderly Bella Coola informant, a certain woman, Sîkwalwaldg by name, left her house one evening for a few minutes. When she came back she was crazy. Her face was green, her mouth and face distorted and twisted, she could only whistle when she tried to talk, and kept endeavouring to walk on her hands. Taking her blankets, she went through the motions of washing them, but instead of using water, she dragged them to and fro through the ashes of the central fire, until, utterly exhausted, she lay down. By these symptoms it was recognized that a ghost had stricken her with madness, and several shamans of the dead were called upon for help. For a long time their efforts were fruitless. Then one of them obtained some stained menstrual pads. While another conducted the frenzic beating of sticks, the leading practitioner waved one of the pads through the smoke of the central fire and laid it, with hemlock bark and dyed cedar-bark, on the patient's face. After leaving it there a few moments, he took it off and, while the beating of sticks was stilled, threw it out the door. When this had been done four times the woman was restored to sanity. Later on she said she had seen the ghost of a certain Tsiwaut, a man recently deceased. Emerging from her trance she found herself in her house surrounded by numerous people and the shaman working over her. If he had not been able to cure her, she would have died; in fact, it was impossible to discover whether the Bella Coola regarded this woman as having been cured of an illness, or as having been restored from the dead.

Sîkwalwaldg called for the singers to whom she sang four songs, relating what she had seen. They described how she stood by a fire in the land below, where the sun travelled from west to east, and where everything differed from this earth, though reminiscent of it. The singers learnt the songs, and it was to their music that the women danced on later occasions. She was able ever afterwards not only to cure maladies caused by ghosts but to talk with them. For this purpose she was in the habit of lying down at night in the graveyard, looking down into the land of the dead which was open to her, and conversing with the inhabitants in a strange whistling language which the living could hear, but could not underground. She was also able to pass downwards on the edge of the central fire towards the door.

Sunkilkmen, an old shaman from the dead who died not long ago, obtained his power by choosing to visit their land. The themes of his songs were of the land of the dead where, he said, there were many people; where those who had been rich on earth were rich, but where those who had been poor were still poor; where those who had been blind could see, and those who had been maimed were whole. He told of Pilaalit, a legless creature who lives in the land below, but can travel with amazing speed. In fact this shaman stated that it was he who was sent when the ghosts wished to communicate with the living, a statement contradicted by others. He told further of Kaumkadjiles, a supernatural woman resident there, who is able to pick berries with phenomenal rapidity. But this talent avails her little, since her basket is full of the teeth of dead men who devour the fruit as fast as she picks them. It was Sunkilkmen who described how in the land below there were only two enormous trees of the kind known to the Bella Coola as kiji, under the shade of which the ghosts played a game resembling football with huge, light balls.

A dead person usually chooses one of his own relatives as the proper person on whom to bestow the power of a shaman, but their actions in this respect are neither to control nor exploit. Ceremonial chastity is of assistance, and power can usually be obtained by anyone who lies four days and four nights, face downwards, on a new grave. Nor does every sight of a deceased person bring with it this faculty; in fact, ghosts are greatly dreaded since they usually cause harm to the beholder. On one occasion the mother of an elderly Bella Coola woman left the house one evening, to return shortly with her face screwed up into a ghastly smile, green in colour, and with saliva dribbling from her mouth. She was quite mad. A shaman from the dead succeeded in curing her, or it may have been in restoring her to life, and she was able to tell how she had seen what she took to be a man with face averted. She shaman pours the grease on the central fire, and throws on it also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the sick-soul to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. Until he gives his first dance a newly crowned shaman is known as a lux, the same word that is used for a dacier initiate, and during this period he wears the shaman's collar of interwoven dyed and undyed cedar-bark. If he is wealthy and influential, a shaman will repeat his dance every fourth year. Such a performance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the dacier ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things oppositely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose power is derived from the dead dances with head bent downwards, his free hand pointing to the ground with four fingers extended. Also his cry of "ewai, ewai, ewai," crowed to increase with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always terminates with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot transmit their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers assist the visionaries in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the distant past, is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which dramatic power is received from the dead.*

* For stories of similar type have been included in vol. I, [illegible] not to explain the life of the dead, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

The Lads Who Visited the Home of the Dead

Long ago there was a Bella Coola man who had two sons. His wife died, and presently he remarried, becoming in time the father of an infant daughter. The second wife abused her step-sons, their father neglected them, and the two were poor and miserable, their best friend a faithful dog. When the people were invited to a feast, the lads were frequently overlooked as being of no importance, and their step-mother used to upbraid them for lacking the spirit to course this insult. They could not answer, but merely hided their time. The two used to sleep on a raised platform behind the fire in hope of receiving supernatural assistance, and always left the house by a hole in the floor rather than through the door, thus observing one of the essentials for those who wish to obtain aid.

One day the two set out on an expedition into the mountains, carrying skin with which to make moccasins. As they were sitting at this work, the dog, which had followed in seeming as usual, ended off barking furiously. The brothers hurriedly finished the shoes and followed the animal in time to see it disappear into an opening after a porcupine. The elder looking, the two entered the cave which grew wider, on and on they went until finally they could see light in the distance. Guided by the barking of the dog ahead of them, they finally emerged into daylight, to find themselves in a new world, a land in which there was a large river and a sky resembling that above the earth, but different. The dog was waiting for them and had stopped barking.

The brothers set off up the river bank and presently saw on the other side a large town in which many people were moving about. The younger brother could see it plainly, but to the elder it was vague and indistinct. They called out to the people:

"Hi! Please send a canoe for us."

Though they called repeatedly, no one paid the slightest attention; the people seemed to be deaf, unaware of their presence. The two brothers remained all day opposite the village, calling out in vain without result, and all the time becoming more hungry and disgusted. Towards dusk one of them yawned widely. To their surprise there was a commotion in the town; the yawn had been heard although their cries had not. They could hear the people on the other side of the river discussing the noise.

"Let us send a canoe to fetch whoever may be over there" was the gist of their remarks.

Presently a canoe was pulled out from the farther shore, and held in position by the ferryman beneath the bank on which the brothers stood, necessitating a jump of two or three feet to reach it. As the elder prepared to leap into it, he glanced down and saw that the canoe on the river floor were visible through the canoe as if it had no bottom at all. He drew back in fear. Though he knew it not, they had come to the land of the dead, where horrendous crones and other phenomena were to be expected. The younger brother, to whom the village had been plainly visible, had no fear, but leapt down heavily, and was pulled across to the farther shore, where he soon disappeared from his brother's sight among the throng of villagers.

The elder youth, left alone with the dog, sat down and wept, thinking that he had indeed lost his brother. After a time he continued his journey up the river-bank where presently he saw a bridge. He eagerly went over, intending to turn back towards the village where his brother had gone, but so soon as he had crossed he lost all thought of his original purpose and continued his journey upstream instead. Presently he heard the sound of adze strokes, and drew near, cautiously, until he could see the man who was using the tool.

"Why have you come here?" the woodcutter asked.

"Oh, for no special reason," the boy replied. "I should like to see your chief."

The woodcutter guided him to the house and when near called out, "The stranger wants to see our chief."

People came rushing out of the houses and the lad realized that he had come to the land of the wolves. His guide directed him to the chief's house which he entered through a doorway cut in a totem-pole. Within, the chief greeted him in a kindly fashion, saying:

"Please sit down for a little while until I can bring some friends to play with you."

He went outside, but presently returned and led him through the door to some mouse-skins which he had spread on the ground under the totem-pole. Then he called the friends, who were four wolves. They came leaping out of the house and devoured the young man; but though his body was in four pieces inside the stomachs of the four animals, he was still conscious. After eating him, the lowers devoured the dog. Presently the wolves vomited into a dish, whereupon the chief re-formed what had been wolfish into a human being, and the lad was as before he had been eaten. Then the canoe was drawn to his dog.

The chief now beat once upon a drum as a signal for the people to adorn themselves for a dance; again he beat, and they assembled. Apparently all was ready, but the boy realized that the leader of the wolves was absent. Again and again the chief beat on the drum, until at last the missing man drew near. He carried singing:

"A lad went out with his younger brother and his dog. A porcupine caused the mountains to open for him."

As he sang, smoke could be seen rising from behind the house; the youth could see that it came from Porcupine's fire, but the song explained that it was eagle down for their mortal guest. The singer repeated his song; more smoke ascended from another place, which the lad saw was Mountain Goat's fire. The song was sung again and again, and at each repetition new smoke could be seen, from the fires of Deer, Black Bear, Whistler, Marten, Beaver, Wolverine, in fact from all animals except Grizzly Bear. The chief explained to his guest that whenever he wanted meat he could go hunting and would be able to see the smoke rising from the fires of various animals.[9]

"Tomorrow you will return home," he continued. "Your brothers (meaning the four wolves that had eaten him) will go with you to carry some presents."

Next morning [it was really a year later] the wolves tied up gifts of smoked meat in blankets woven of goat wool and sewn blankets of whistler, black bear, and marten. The meat, though a large quantity, was reduced to so small a compass that the four animals carried it without difficulty. The five travelled back to the spot where the two brothers had sat down to make their moccasins, and at that point the wolves returned to their home.

Now for the first time the lad remembered his brother, and began to weep bitterly, thinking that he must be dead. But presently he heard the sound of footsteps inside the cave through which the porcupine had guided him; they grew nearer, until the younger boy emerged. The elder was overjoyed, but his delight was turned to dismay when he saw that his brother's face was green and haggard, with a strange expression; that he had lost all the flesh from his body, and that his clothes, the same that he had worn when they parted company, were torn to tatters. His brother's appearance affected him so much that he fell down dead. The younger lad, however, had been made a shaman by the dead, so he quickly restored his brother. They exchanged experiences; the younger saying that the dead had given him the name Kipdes. His appearance was vastly improved when he clad himself in a black bear blanket and two whistler cloaks brought by the other from the village of the wolves. The two returned home, entering the house secretly and lying down at once

[9] To understand this the reader must remember the firm Bella Coola belief that dead animals can assume different forms. To the ordinary person they appear as men, but in reality they lead lives resembling those of humans, having houses, fires, blankets, and other comforts. An individual who is able to see the smoke of their fires will have no difficulty in finding the homes of the animals and hence will have great success in hunting. The only one this lad was to avoid was Grizzly Bear, who was so fierce that pursuing him would be dangerous.

on their old bed on the raised platform behind the fire. No one knew of their arrival.

Although neither the father nor the step-mother of the lads had shown them any affection when they were at home, as soon as they were lost both had been overwhelmed with grief. They lost all energy and, sunk in misery and self-recrimination, would sometimes lie for days on opposite sides of the house, not even keeping a fire alight. The other inhabitants of the village considered them beneath contempt, and often at night they would relieve themselves in the house of the sorrowing couple. The only person with any energy in the household was their daughter, now a child about five years old. On the day of her half-brothers' return she happened to throw some rubbish on the fire and, as it flared up, she saw long hair hanging down from the raised bed. She called out to her mother:

"Perhaps my brothers have come home. I see the hair hanging down."

But the mother answered: "Be quiet. Your brothers have been away for a year, we do not even know how they died."

The little girl was not satisfied. She threw more rubbish on the fire and again she saw the long pendant hair. When she told her mother the woman cried out angrily:

"Be quiet, you little liar!"

The two brothers had been listening to this dialogue, and the elder now took a mountain goat bladder filled with grease which he lowered so that it swung to and fro beneath the platform. When the little girl again threw rubbish on the fire her eye was attracted by the swinging object which she took and carried to her mother with the remark:

"My brothers must certainly have come home, see what they have brought."

Now the woman believed, and carried the bladder to her husband on the other side of the house, telling him the glad news. Together they went to the raised platform where the elder brother greeted them, but lied, saying:

"I am alone, I do not know what has happened to my younger brother."

In his delight at the return of one of his sons the father became sufficiently energetic to cut some firewood, such an unusual undertaking that some of his neighbours came to ascertain the meaning of it. He told them the news, which was passed around until the whole village knew, and all assembled in the house except those who, having polluted it, were now frightened to appear. The two brothers did not come down, and only the elder spoke to those gathered below. One malicious person tried to injure him by throwing on to the roof not far from his head a pad stained with menstrual blood, but Ḱipdxs, by means of his magical power, knew that it was there, and whispered to his brother, who passed the information to his father, so that the old man was able to remove the pad before either of his sons was injured. The elder brother told the people where he had left large supplies of meat. This they brought in with great rejoicing the next day.

Although the two brothers remained constantly concealed, rumours began to circulate that the elder was not alone. After a time it became generally known that the supposition was correct, and that the younger brother had received a shaman's power from the dead. A malicious chief made the statement that he did not believe this and cast insinuations as to why a shaman should conceal himself. Ḱipdxs used his power to inject sickness into the man and after a few days he died, though no one knew the cause.

Then the elder lad said, "My younger brother has told me that you should not bury the dead man too quickly. Let him try to restore him."

Some of the deceased's relatives were willing, others were not, but at last they agreed to give Ḱipdxs an opportunity to show his skill, and he revived the dead man without any difficulty. In his gratitude the chief gave the restorer his daughter as a wife. Not long after, another chief expressed his disbelief and again the shaman caused him to become sick. This time the people at once appealed to Ḱipdxs for help; this was refused, but when the man died he restored him, as he had done on the previous occasion. As before, he received a wife as a mark of gratitude. The reputation of Ḱipdxs was now established; many dead persons were brought to him to be restored and through the presents given to him he was able to give potlatches. Nor did he forget his elder brother, but obtained wives for him too. Meanwhile the latter was having great success in hunting and brought in so much meat that he was able to give a potlatch at which his younger brother danced and was given a name.

One evening,* not long after this time, a little girl about six years old kept crying and crying; nothing would pacify her. The parents tried to soothe her but at last the mother said:

"Let's go away and leave her, the dead will take her."

So all in the household withdrew to the bedrooms, leaving the girl weeping beside the central fire. Presently her cries grew fainter, and the mother rushed out, but her daughter had vanished. The echo were coming from beneath the ground, and they realized that it was indeed the dead who had taken the mother at her word and had seized the child. It sounded as if the girl were just beneath the surface of the ground, so the people threw resinous sticks on the fire and followed to the graveyard, where the cries led them. They took sticks and dug furiously, but could not catch up to her, for the sobs grew fainter and fainter as the child was carried below.

In their despair the parents called Ḱipdes.

"All right," he replied, "I will try to bring her back. Please leave me alone in my house and I will invite the dead to a feast."

He collected all the vessels with urine in them from the village and gave one to each of a number of assistants whom he stationed around the walls of his house hidden beneath the roof. Then he invited the dead, who assembled with the exception of the woman who was taking care of the little girl. After repeated invitations she too came, and took her place on the chief's seat behind the fire, with the weeping child in her arms. Ḱipdes gave the signal and his assistants emptied the vessels. At once the dead people became impotent and sank as heaps of bones to the floor, leaving the little girl apparently unharmed. The parents picked her up eagerly and the bones were swept out to the graveyard.

The child kept crying out for salmon-berries, which were unprocurable, as it was winter. So the parents appealed again to Ḱipdes, who understood that what she wanted were snowberries, which are as salmon-berries to the dead, in whose land she must have eaten them. She would eat nothing else and, as they are not nutritious, she soon died, nor could she again be restored to life.

* A similar version omits any mention of a step-mother as the reason for the boys leaving home, and simply begins with their following the dog into a cleft of the mountains. The dead, after receiving the younger boy as in the preceding tale, try to make him eat "cranberries," which are in reality the eyes of corpses. Meanwhile, the elder youth encounters the wolves, but in this case is given instructions about entering their house, whereby he escapes being eaten and is greeted cordially and granted a boon before leaving. This is the ability to gain a desire by merely wishing for it. It is by exercising this power that he meets his long-lost brother. In this account the younger boy's name received from the dead is Ḱdyskimut, and Death, Sa-lma, gives him a stick with which to lift him from his position on the lid of a coffin. In the end Sa-lma, his patron, recalls the young shaman to himself. This version, which is the more abbreviated of the two, makes no allusion to the attempted rescue of a child from the land of ghosts.

Direct Revelations from the Supreme God

As has been noted, a shaman receives his power from one or other supernatural being, not from the supreme god, Ālquntām, himself. Yet instances are known to the Bella Coola of such benefactions, and to a visionary so endowed the term snāyom is applied. In every case a revelation of this type is considered to have taken place comparatively recently. In view of the manner in which biblical tales, introduced by Europeans, have spread from tribe to tribe in distorted form, it is not improbable that all such examples of the direct appearance of the supreme being can be traced to this source. Having heard from the white man of cases where the deity has appeared to men, the Indians would be only too ready and willing to accept and transmit such a tale, since it belongs to their general culture pattern. In the example here given, the instructions about dissemination of the knowledge imparted in the vision, as well as the claimed foreknowledge of European houses, strongly suggests a post-white man origin. Further, once the concept of the possible appearance of the supreme god is accepted—and no Bella Coola would question the accuracy of accounts heard from others—it would be a simple matter to attribute the powers of very strong shamans to this source. Accordingly, several typical shaman stories have been included in this section because it is claimed that the principal characters in each was a snāyom; it is highly probable, however, that if such a tale could have been collected when the whites first reached British Columbia, he would have appeared as nothing more than a shaman.

A Snāyom

A man whose home was on the lower Fraser was once cooking fish with hot stones in a box. To do this properly he needed four sets of heaters; when the food was nearly ready and he was dropping one of the fourth collection of stones into the box, the tongs, weakened by much hard usage, broke. The stone fell into the boiling water with a splash, severely burning the man, who, as it was salmon time, wore no clothing.

Even in his pain he thought of the way in which human beings are less protected than beasts and this idea troubled him so much that he fainted. Alqantem saw that the man was distressed and while he was still unconscious appeared to him, saying:

"I see you are worried about your lack of clothing. I have a message for you. Strange people, somewhat resembling yourselves, are approaching from the far east. They will help you out of your plight. You will find them cooking without the cumbersome boiling box; their houses will be warm and they will even have smooth coverings to their floors; there will be special places for sleeping and wonderful cooking-pots. Though all be warm in these houses, yet the fire will be invisible."

As a result of this vision the man became a snāxom. In the autumn he moved toward the coast and built for himself a house of special type with a raised sleeping platform in it, reached by a ladder.

Alqantem had told him to transmit his message to other tribes, and for this purpose he travelled to the sites of Seattle, Comox, and Nanaimo, telling what he had heard in his trance. He further said that the newcomers would wear clothing, leaving only hands, feet, and faces exposed. This, too, he had learnt from the vision, also that the strangers would arrive during the generation of his hearers.

His fellow tribesmen used to eat large quantities of clams, which could be gathered only at the time of full-moon or new-moon, when the far-receding tide exposed a great expanse of clam-bed. The people decided to test his power by asking him if he could not gather the shell-fish at a time when the tide was medium and the beds covered. The visionary was on his platform in the upper part of his house, but without raising his head, he said:

"You, get ready; I will join you immediately."

He descended, passed through the doubting crowd which made way for him, and went to the ocean, with eyes tightly closed. Arrived at the water, he lowered his hand to feel it, then carefully put his foot under the surface, as if it were a mat. He advanced with short steps, going through the motions of one who rolls something back with his feet, and as he did so the water piled up as if it had been a mat, exposing the clam-bed. When he felt sands under his feet he knew that the outer edge of the bed was reached and accordingly stopped, turned his back to the sea, which was now high as a wall, and held it back, without becoming wet. He called to his tribesmen who came and gathered the clams, though some looked doubtfully at the wall of water behind them. When all who wished had done so, he ordered them to leave and returned towards the shore himself; the water following him, became normal and recovered its former area.

177 The details of this incident are sufficiently circumstantial
* 756 to presuppose a distorted historical event. Moreover, many
* 787 of the old people had heard of the incident, another indication of the accuracy of the tradition. As far as could be judged, [539] news of the vision must have reached Bella Coola about the year 1800.[11] It is said that the snāxom sang the following song [533] in a language unknown to any of his hearers: Aqwimıcu aqwimıcu sisils axwamıc qwisiya.[12] None of the older men appear to have any idea of the meaning of these words, or even of the language to which they belong.

No event has had such profound effect on the lives of the Indians of British Columbia as the coming of the white man. It would be surprising if, looking backwards, they did not feel that it had been foretold by prophets. The preceding story is the only Bella Coola example of such a belief, although tales of a similar kind are found widely throughout the province. In addition, there are a few traditions of prophecies fulfilled by the white man. One of these is that long, long ago, a shaman stated that in the future the dead would return with the ability to make fire by rubbing the end of a small twig along a rough surface, and that, soon after, all the Indians would die. The Bella Coola consider that matches are referred to in the first part of the statement, and read their own doom

[174] [11]The approximate date was determined in the following manner: The most complete account of the event was obtained from a man fifty-six years old in 1924 who had heard the details from his mother. He was the youngest of a large family, so it is probable that his mother was about forty-five years of age when he was born. When a child of about ten, she had been told of the vision by a woman just passed the age of child-bearing, who had recently reached adolescence when news of the event reached Bella Coola. The figures can be arranged in tabular form.

Duration of the informant's life	56 years.
Interval between his birth and the time his mother heard the news	35 years.
Interval between transmission of the news to the informant's mother and its receipt in Bella Coola	35 years.
Total	126 years.

Allowing for exaggerations, this would make the correct date about 1800.

[12] [126] A phonograph record was made of this song for the National Museum of Canada. Recorded as song VII D 21b; singer, Jim Pollard.

in the second, as indicated by their diminished population. It is also said that about 1850, when a party of Bella Coola had camped for the night near Ocean Falls, one of the sleepers wakened his comrades by calling on them to look at the brilliant lights. No one then understood what he meant, but the meaning has become clear since the installation of electric lights in the town. 177 756* 787*

In addition to the preceding, a number of stories of the regular shaman type were collected, in which, however, the principal figure is said to have been a snäxom. They are included in this section for the reasons already mentioned. 539 ● 756* 787*

A POTENTIAL Snaxom

The mother of an elderly Bella Coola used to receive direct communications from Ālquntäm which gave her the necessary qualifications for a snäxom, though she did not wish to exercise her power. She was able to see over the whole earth, and to talk to sun, moon, and stars in a language which the other Bella Coola did not understand. She built a small house for herself in the woods where she usually slept alone; sometimes her husband joined her, but he was always afraid of the gigantic toads and other monsters that were her companions.

THE WOMAN WHO COULD CALL THUNDER

About one hundred years ago there was living in a village at the mouth of the Dean River, a man, urwinxdla, and his wife, Snuqwaix. He was a famous hunter who frequently observed ceremonial chastity and his wife claimed to be a shaman, but the inhabitants of the villages on both the Dean and Kimsquit rivers doubted this, as did also those living in the lower Bella Coola valley. Snuqwaix was so boastful and disagreeable that at last the chiefs held a meeting and went one day to her house, where they told her that if she failed to give a satisfactory demonstration of her powers she would be killed.[11] Some were ashamed to doubt her word, but the concensus of opinion was that she should prove her claims, so they all sat down in her house and waited. She looked around and selected one man, Kuskual, without apparent reason, and told him that he was to summon Thunder for her. The spectators began to beat time while she danced sunwise. After some time she told Kuɪlkuɪl to call Thunder, telling him what to say, and to address this supernatural being by his shaman's name, Xwinxwitsakumlaix, instead of the usual Saiutl. Kuɪlkuɪl did as she bade him. Then the spectators again beat time, and again she danced, and for the second time her helper called to Xwinxwitsakumlaix. A third time the performance was repeated and after Kuɪlkuɪl had called she said to him:

[11] Such power on the part of chiefs is most unusual and, though it was related without comment by the narrator, should not be regarded as historically correct. [622]

"You have reached him, he is looking back towards us."

Some of the spectators began to be frightened. After the fourth time of dancing and calling, a violent peal of thunder was heard, and all believed her. Then she stood up and stated that she had learnt a song from Ālqunūm, who had given her power in a dream. She taught the singers the following words:

"Our father is Ālqunūm who is going to look after us."

After this she told the people to go to the river, throw water over their heads, and pray to Ālqunūm to help them.

Next day she announced that she was going to a village on the Dean River to give a demonstration of her powers to convince the sceptics, and that she would like a number of the Kimsquit River people to accompany her. Some were unwilling, because they thought that if she were unsuccessful they would be held up to scorn, but Snufnaix assured them that if she failed she would commit suicide, so they consented to go with her. Arrived at the Dean River village, all the inhabitants gathered to meet her in the house of one of the principal chiefs. She danced as she had done in her own house, four times, and after each dance Kuɪlkuɪl summoned Xwinxwitsakumlaix on her behalf. After the fourth calling there was a violent peal of thunder, which convinced all of her power. She likewise taught them the tune that she had learnt in her dream from Ālqunūm.

After this second demonstration Snufnaix asked some of her fellow villagers to accompany her to Bella Coola. Again they were afraid, especially as it was November when thunder is most unusual in British Columbia, but she quieted their fears and they set out with her. On reaching Kumqo·ts she went to the house of a chief, where the inhabitants both of that village and neighbouring ones soon gathered to greet her in such numbers that many had to remain outside. The shamaness danced as she had done on the previous occasions, and as before Kuɪlkuɪl called to Xwinxwitsakumlaix:

"Your comrade wants you."

Immediately after the fourth summons there was a violent peal of thunder, and those Bella Coola who had been uncertain of her power were convinced. She taught them the tune that she had obtained in her dream and for eight days remained in the vicinity, carrying out the instructions of Ālqunūm by healing the sick. She was able to cure a patient by merely looking at him, and pressing the place where the pain was situated. It was universally agreed that she had justified her claims to shamanism; the coming of Thunder three times could be no accident. Ālqunūm had given her the power and designated Thunder as the particular supernatural being to bring it to her. From him she received the name, Xwinxwitsakmlaix.

When Snuqwaix returned home to Kimsquit, she told her husband that he must never again hold intercourse with her or she would die. This is in accordance with an old tradition; at her suggestion they continued to live together, and he strictly obeyed her command for one year. Then he disobeyed it and she died immediately.

A KIMSQUIT Snāyom

A Kimsquit woman, Kusiyat, claimed to be a snāyom, but the Bella Coola were unconvinced. On one occasion she, and a large number of Kimsquit people, came to Bella Coola where they were entertained in the house of Pstlas; guests from the whole valley came there to see her and a doubter asked her to show her power. Kusiyat complied with the request.

"I want a man with a strong wash-basin," she said.

When she had chosen her assistant she said to him:

"You shall be my medium. The people have asked for an exhibition of my skill, and I want you to repeat to the powers above what I tell you."

She said something to him, which he repeated. Kusiyat laughed.

"That is good. They are moving," she remarked, "speak to them again."

He repeated her words a second, third, and fourth time at her bidding. Then she said to the spectators:

"Hide all the small children under the blankets."

Some were impressed and did as she had ordered, but others were sceptical and refrained. There came a crash and a blinding light, whereupon those who had neglected to cover their children hastily did so. A second, third, and fourth peal of thunder succeeded the first until the house boards rattled. Then she said to the doubter:

"What manifestation would you like, the powers are ready!"

"That is enough," he answered tersely, whereat everyone laughed.

Kusiyat dismissed her mouthpiece and the meeting broke up. Next winter the smallpox reached Kimsquit, claiming among its other victims

Power Localized in Certain Spots

778 To the Bella Coola every supernatural being is, or should [776] be, able to move, in fact many of them can travel with phe-
[773] nomenal rapidity. But, in the beginning of time, when Ałquntēm was populating the earth, he sent down certain creatures which were later turned to stone, thereby localizing their power. The term for a place where this happened is smā·tl, which can be translated with accuracy as, "A Locality Where Power has Become Petrified." It follows that anyone desirous of coming in contact with supernatural power of this type can do so by visiting the spot where it is situated. There [773] are not many of these places, nor do they figure prominently in Bella Coola mythology, and, as usual, there are many contradictions in the accounts. Apparently there is a tendency to ascribe the occurrence of peculiar experiences to localities where power is petrified. The following are the more important spots of this type, with a short account of the specific attributes of each.

773 (1) Smaiew·a, also called Skałkwaily: At the head of the 778 Clearwater, one of the sources of the Bella Coola River, and 539 the place from which comes the warm east wind.

Concerning the origin of the power in this spot the following tale, which is regarded as very ancient, was obtained.

Long, long ago, the ocean spread far to the east, covering the whole Bella Coola valley.[14] The shoreline of the ocean was at the village Skałkwaily, so called from a chief of that name living there. Mount Xłłwał, which is now several miles inland, was then a point around which surged dangerous [14] It is mentioned that the world was unpopulated at that time, though mention is made of people who were living there. This does not strike the Bella Coola as a contradiction; the accuracy of an ancient story is never questioned, hence it is taken for granted that "people" in the modern sense, were not then in existence.

currents, and where there was always much wind, making it feared by mariners in those distant days. Tradition does not state what being drove back the ocean to its present position; it may have been Raven who made the Bella Coola valley habitable. 773 778 539

Once a war party from the north swooped down to attack Sluxlekwailx's town. Although the chief's herald, who was stationed a mile below the settlement, called out a warning, the raiders were successful and carried off a number of slaves. Sluxlekwailx could not bear to think of his people as captives and accordingly exerted his miraculous power to turn the whole place to stone. Houses, raiders, captives, canoes with their carvings, and paddles can still be seen there, all petrified. They have become smä·tl.

According to another account, Sluxlekwailx exerted his powers to petrify the canoes and the bodies of his enemies before they reached his village. He asked the paddlers whither they were bound, and when they told him he, or the mountain which he later became, for there is a confusion between the two, invited them to land. On so doing they were changed to stone, and in this form can still be seen, complete even to the paddles, a proof that the ocean once extended far to the east of its present limit. Many Bella Coola have heard of these canoes, and they are said to have been seen recently.

Since that time the power animating the place has frequently become visible in the form of an enormous snake. There, too, are to be found countless smaller ones, a constant menace to the unwary. The following incidents describe the adventures of people passing near this spot: 778 539 [787]

The trail to the interior makes a detour to avoid Sluxlekwailx, but sometimes one of the reptiles, many of which are enormous, will be found lying across the track. If the traveller is bold and jumps over it, no harm will come to him, but if he should try to avoid it by going around, the single snake will increase to a multitude. Not only material objects, but the intelligence of Sluxlekwailx has become petrified there and resents any slights.

Four men were once passing the spot on their way to the interior when one of them, in bravado, pushed with his stick against the stones which once had been the houses of the village, saying as he did so:

"Sluxlekwailx, petrify us if you can, we are not afraid of you."

When he drew up his stick it was covered with small snakes; more appeared from everywhere and swarmed over the four like ants. They started to run, but three of them were crushed beneath the swarming creatures and nothing was ever seen of them. The fourth man drew his knife and with it slit his clothing, thus dislodging most of the snakes, and, naked, he was able to run away. He succeeded in reaching some people to whom he told the fate of his companions, but soon his stomach began to swell and he died. Snakes had entered his body and his case had been hopeless from the start.

On another occasion four girls had just climbed a steep and difficult trail behind the smā·tl to avoid passing through the place itself. On reaching the level land above, one of them called out:

"Sluxlekwailx, I am glad to be safely past you."

But the jealous Sluxlekwailx heard her. He sent a gale, the ground rocked, trees were torn and broken, and three of the girls were swept away to their death. One only escaped by wrapping herself around the bole of a tree.

Another time four Carriers on their way to the coast passed a boulder on the shore of a pool which is at Sluxlekwailx. Although aware of the power petrified there, they derided it by thrusting poles below the rock and asking it why it did not show its strength by taking revenge for the insults they offered it. When they pulled out the sticks they were covered with snakes, and more appeared from the trees and roots in the vicinity. The Carriers fled, pursued by them, and after running all day, managed to make their escape at dusk.

The place is still allegedly characterized by these reptiles; a recent visitor found the branches of the trees like snakes, and the very roots were in the form of them. The rocks in the vicinity are full of grooves like those made by snakes crawling through soft clay, and the whole neighbourhood reeks with their odour. 778 539

(2) Pe-lsb, Mesatche Nose: The point between North Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel. 778

Here is found a snaxy, one of the most powerful localized beings, a creature comprising only a head and an arm with a mouth in the palm. The head can be seen in rock on the point not far above the waterline, but the giant arm rests far beneath the surface. At times the snaxy bends its elbow so that the fist can support the head, as if the creature were pondering. On such occasions the upper part of the arm remains concealed below the water, while there is a gap about twenty-five yards in width between the upraised lower part and the rocky shore beneath the animal's head. A canoe can pass in safety through this, narrow though the channel is; but if it should take a course on the outer side of the arm the latter will crash down on the helpless craft, crushing it to splinters and driving these far beneath the surface. There has never been a survivor from such a catastrophe. The last time the arm was raised was about seventy years ago when a war party was returning to the north after raiding Tāl ie. They knew the necessity of taking the inner channel, so escaped unharmed, though they actually handled the mighty upraised limb. The Bella Coola firmly believe that the snaxy will some day lift its arm again, and will crush the steamer that carries mail and passengers up the coast. 796

It was only a few hundred years ago that a certain Bella Bella learnt of the respect with which the other supernatural beings regard the snaxy of Mesatche Nose. The canoe in which this man was travelling was sucked down beneath the ocean, but Qomayne admitted him as a guest to his house. The chief had invited all the underwater supernatural beings to a pot- 778 539

778 latch, and the only vacant spot was the central seat behind the fire. Retainer after retainer was sent after someone, until
● 539 finally the wondering human heard a steady thump, thump, approaching. It was the Mesatche Nose swaxy, travelling on his single arm, like a looper caterpillar, his head balanced precariously on top while the thump came every time that he brought his fist to the floor. On his entry, the paintings of fish and marine animals, with which the walls and boxes were covered, came to life and cavorted around as if mad, but when the chief took his seat behind the fire they returned to their pictorial form. From this experience the Bella Bella man obtained a nsaak name and myth.

823 beginning of time it was a man.
109 He, Nusalxwtił, (which means "Too Heavy" in the sense of "so important") came to earth from above at Cape Mudge and decided to visit Bella Coola. He stalked through the land to the site of the present Mount Nusqalst, wearing a high hat around which crowded two snakes whose heads often crossed. From where he stood, he saw the lofty mountain Łqaic in the Carrier country, and resolved to visit it. At that distant period this peak was a human being and from him Nusalxwtił obtained two wives, the name of one being Ṫlsla. He returned to Bella Coola with them. 778

Nänalskwitl knew that presently he was fated to become immobile, a seat of petrified power. Since he was able to select where this was to be, he chose the site of Mount Nazqalst, midway in the Bella Coola valley, as a convenient place to overlook the doings of men. Before he transformed himself into this mountain, he determined that he would have people visit him; accordingly he changed his axe, Nazhmidjusta, which he carried concealed beneath his blanket, into sqalst, a stone much used for axes and adzes. Until the introduction of white man's tools his wish was gratified; people came from far and near to obtain the necessary material. 530 823 103 [316]

The human origin of the mountain is still remembered, since it is often spoken of by its chiefly names, Nänalskwitl and Ṫlsla, relics of its existence as a man. This story is regarded as an origin myth, and as such might have been included in vol. I, chap. vi.

This mountain is regarded with awe by the Bella Coola on account of its great height, but it seems to lack most of the characteristics ascribed to other places where power has been petrified.

(10) On one of the mountains above Cascade Inlet there used to be a stone eagle with outstretched wings which came to this earth with the first people, but was petrified one day when drying its wings after fishing. About 1860 part of its beak fell away. A change in the condition of any of these places had long been regarded as an omen of misfortune, so the epidemic of smallpox that soon after ravaged the coast was not unexpected. 778 [164] [787] *

(11) Ätsmoo: An unidentified spot where a snuuq of the mountain was petrified. At this place there is a small pool which is the repository (II, p. 8) of a certain kasiut dancer.

(12) uxpalam, "The Walker," the name both of a supernatural being and the spot where it is localized. This is not far from the glacier that lies near the junction of the trails from Swaloli and Tälio; it is the largest one in the vicinity of Bella Coola and is said to move its position. The being is in some way connected with it, hence the name. [776] ceremonial chastity. This state is pleasing to supernatural beings, who otherwise are likely to punish one trespassing on their haunts. The Bella Coola have not clearly formulated their beliefs with regard to these places, consequently the experiences of one individual are usually quite different from those of another, a circumstance regarded as quite natural on the assumption that the supernatural beings are able to manifest themselves in many ways.

Sterkwaily and the Hot Springs on Labouchere Channel are the places that figure most commonly in mythology. At the former is Sterkwaily's chamber-vessel, a pool always full of clear water though not fed by any spring. If a person suffering from the virulent skin disease known as tlokoly swims in it, drinks some of the water, and then vomits, he will recover.

Not only the pond itself, but the whole neighbourhood, is the seat of mysterious power, as the following tale describes.

Near the western end of the pool there is a rock from which long ago three men dived and failed to return. A sick man decided to do the same and leapt in, feet first, wearing around his chest some dyed cedar-bark. He plunged through the water and found that he was standing on the roof of a house; he walked around it, then returned to the surface, and back to his starting point. He dived three times more, and when he emerged for the fourth time his sickness had left him. He returned to Bella Coola and told of his experience. Since that time sick people have been carried to the pool, and have dived in from the same rock, always feet first, and always wearing dyed cedar-bark. All are able to feel the roof of the house, and are cured by the immersion.

The trail used by the Carrier Indians when raiding the coastal tribes passed by this lake, and on one occasion the Bella Coola, bent on retaliation, used the same path and paused to rest on the shore. They all bathed in the pool and asked help from the power there localized, then as they lay on the grass drying their long hair in the sunshine, a house emerged. Slowly it floated upwards, filling the whole area formerly occu-

[778] pied by the water, and came to rest when it had risen to the
* [787] usual height of a house. As each of the spectators gazed upon
* 539 it he saw within that on which his own mind was centered. As it were in perspective he visualized his whole life, both past and future. One man saw the slaying of an enemy, another a potlatch with himself in the role of donor, another his children, and a unusual individual saw a man and woman in the usual act. To each it appeared that the house contained only one image. Then slowly the house sank into the depths. The party went on and had great success, killing their enemies, who were powerless before them, without the loss of a single Bella Coola. It was this house which the sick people felt with their [759] feet; the sight of it had given the warriors phenomenal ability.

[778] Another seat of power is near the western end of the lake
* [787] where the trail passes between two piles of dark red rocks that rise to a height of three or four feet. Each is roughly squared like a brick with dimensions of approximately 8 by 6 by 6 inches. The lumps are not regular, and yet form a distinct cairn. If a person by wishes to ascertain the length of his life, he takes a stick and shows out one of the stones, which falls far down the hillside; if he can do so without disturbing the rest, he will have long life, but should fate decree for him a short one, the whole pile falls in disorder. Another sign of long life is when the stone sways back and forth, emitting a squeaking sound like the leather in a new shoe, so he endeavours to poke out one of the rocks of which it is composed. On the traveller's return from the interior the lump has always returned to original shape, though no one has ever seen one of the stones being picked up by human agency.

[778] Sick people also derive benefit from immersion in the Hot [765] Springs on Labouchere Channel. The following account was obtained from a man who himself underwent treatment there.

539 When a young man he had been initiated into the Raven [778] society as a Breaker (II, p. 123) and as such wore a bear-skin cloak. His relatives were wealthy and advised him to keep his role, saying that they would make it possible for him to dance again in eight years. Four years later, one of his fellow-villagers offered him five skins for the one which he had used, and, when this was declined, the number was raised to ten, then to fifteen, and finally to twenty-one bear-skins. As there was no particular value in the mantle itself, the owner became suspicious and asked advice from his mother who admonished him not to sell, in view of the time when he would want it. Accordingly, he did not accept the offer, but when it was increased to twenty-five skins he did so. He did not know that the purchaser's desire for it was to enable him to injure the seller by magic through the acquisition of his personal possession.

The sale took place in April, and the following December the former owner became crippled with a disease which so weakened his back that he could hardly raise himself from the ground. When the sickness had lasted for one year, his friends carried him away to the Hot Springs on Lakeselchem Channel.

It was known that if a person were left night and day in the spring, unclothed himself with hemlock boughs, to whom was given such power by a supernatural being that, like a demon of old, he could kill at sight by means of a stick. Many of this man's relatives had been killed by such sticks of their access in giving protection, so it was feared that he might wish to continue if he gained such power. To prevent this, he was removed from the spring at night. On the first day as he lay on a mat in the warm water, there appeared on a far ocean a diminutive man, about two feet tall, resembling a Bella Coola savage for a short tail. It was probably a dogfish, such as his first ancestor had obtained (I, p. 600). The little creature ran around the ocean, when it returned to the starting point it stopped and was joined by a second one of the same kind. The two circled the ocean three times, at each occasion stopping at the starting point; they then vanished. The next day while the patient lay in the ocean he heard from within the mountain four beats of a drum and a sound as if a large number of people were talking and calling together, though he could not distinguish any actual words. This sound, to be followed by the hissing sound of escaping steam, the water became so unbearably hot that, crippled though he was, he managed to crawl out. His courage soon revived, so, wrapping his head in his blanket, he returned to the spring. The water was still unpleasantly hot on his body and legs, but the covering protected his head. The same phenomenon occurred on the two following days. Four days later he was well enough to walk and was brought home. During his sojourn he saw supernatural beings, and is still hoping for a further revelation that will make him a shaman. He believes that this would have been granted to him if his friends had allowed him to remain in the spring overnight.

During the four days of his immersion he ate nothing, and his only nourishment was a little mountain goat grease which he did not swallow but kept in the right side of his mouth. After each bath he scrubbed himself with hemlock boughs. In all such cases, he was kept by observed continence and refrained from eating unwholesome salmon. Failure to observe these rules would have caused his death.*

According to another account the creature that visits a patient lying in the Hot Springs is a tekkel. As already described, it is a hairless animal, about as large as a small mouse, with legs so short that its belly almost scrapes the ground, no tail, and a large head with glassy-like eyes. The whole appearance suggests an enormous walking snake. This animal approaches the sick person, so he has as a fire escape* in the spring and takes a bite from wherever the sick man is situated. No wound can afterwards be seen, but the sickness is carried away with the bitten. If the patient should lack courage and endeavour to escape he would soon die.

Cases of these attacks of the same or similar nature have been observed about forty miles up the Bula Coda valley.

* See vol. 1, p. 400 for further cases of this treatment.
* There are two of them, one used by men and the by women.

itself up to be by withstanding the crushing weight of stone and earth. An old Kimsquit man expressed the firm conviction that his great age was the result of this treatment soon after birth. 789 156 816 [824]

To Counteract Impervious ness to Cold

Kill a water ouzel, warm it at a fire, then press it against every part of the infant's body. This makes him as heedless of cold water as the bird. A merganser may be used in the same way, or the foot of one be placed in the child's hand and pressed while fingers clutch it. 789 825 156

To Cause Quarrelsome Disposition

Burn the nest of wasps and rub the ashes on the infant's face. He will become as bellicose and quick to resent injury as the insects. One old man who habitually beats his wife explains that this is involuntary, since he was treated in this way when a child. Fighting is no longer allowed, so the only person on whom he can exercise his martial ardour is his wife. The woman regards the treatment as a matter of course and the reason is accepted as valid by her associates. [155]

To Counteract in Thieving

Kill a jack-rat, warm it at a fire, and rub the carcass lightly over the infant's body. This will make him as successful a thief as the animal. Other methods are to cut off a foot and put this in the infant clutches it in his fingers, or to rub its hands with the ashes of a burnt rat.

To Counteract in Singing

Catch a live robin or cmamamanh (probably one of the thrushes) warm it at a fire, and rub it lightly against the infant's throat, saying: 533 789 825 156

"Maybe he a singer like you."

Then release the bird, and the child will grow up a songster. The following story is told of the power of the cmamamanh's song: [539]

538 In the beginning of time is used to sing.

789 "I shall use a spoon and eat when the Bella Coola River has burst its bounds on account of the incoming salmon in it."

825 The people used to laugh as it repeated this song year after year, until the bird changed its note:

856 "I shall use a spoon and eat when all is cold and clear. Then there will be Death instead of salmon in Bella Coola."

[534] The next year the streams were so clear that no fish could be caught and the starving people asked the bird to return to its first song. When it did so, the water became murky so that it was possible to catch salmon once more.

The Bella Bella, not the Bella Coola, use the body of a blue jay to cause an infant to grow up with the ability to master difficult tunes in the same way that the bird has a variety of notes. The method of applying this medicine could not be learnt.

789 Most of the above medicines are well known and can be applied by any parent. If, however, a man has employed one 856 of them successfully on a number of occasions, he is often requested to use his ability for others. In such a case, the father of the benefited child is expected to reimburse his friend. [784] The application or non-application of such medicines is purely the concern of the child's family; they can use as many as they like, or none at all, according to their discretion.

The following medicines are used during the first year of life:

304 To Cause Beauty

789 Bandages of the softest undyed cedar-bark are prepared for 856 infants of both sexes soon after birth. A woman who is a good 532 artist is requested to draw with charcoal two pictures on one of the pieces of bark—of handsome men if the child is a boy, or of lovely women if a girl. An unmarked wrapping is fastened round the infant's head, then the painted one so arranged that one picture is over the forehead, the other over the occiput, and finally other plain bandages to cover the whole. These are left in place for about one year. They flatten the forehead

754 drink water. This washed the sickness down into his own stomach, which rotted away so that he died. Recovery of their chicken saved the Christians from injury on this occasion.

Although the Bella Coola suspect that several of their tribesmen are sorcerers, their work is so carefully concealed that it is naturally difficult to obtain evidence against them. A few years ago, however, the two daughters of a Tlö'ix man were searching for a calf lost by their father when they found a coal-oil can half hidden in a bush near the pasture fence. They poured into it, and were shocked to find a decayed human leg. They hurried home to their father, who investigated and found that it was the portion from knee to ankle, and that it was partly covered by a sock made for himself by his wife. This so terrified him that he took the find to the Indian Agent, who is believed still to have it. The finder was convinced that the deaths of several of his children must have been caused by earlier activities of the same, or another sorcerer. He suspected another Tlö'ix man who had cleared a small farm in the vicinity, and who asked the two girls whether they had found a jam-tin near the place where the leg had been discovered.

The Bella Coola agree that sorcerers were more powerful in early times than at present, and recount a number of stories describing their activities. The following examples require no further explanation and clearly illustrate their beliefs.

A BELLA BELLA SORCERER

539 754 Not many years ago, in a Bella Bella bad boy dancing, he saw a man approaching him with a stick to one end of which was fastened a tuft of cedar-bark. He quickly realized that it must be a sorcerer who had come to collect some of his exhaled breath as a personal possession, as he pretended to be asleep. The villain came nearer, held the sponge-like bark before the sleeper's face for a moment, and then stole away. He did not know that his intended victim was following him. The sorcerer entered his house, cautiously drew out a human leg bone and tied the tuft of bark to it; then, satisfied by the strain, he went to sleep. This was the victim's opportunity. He crept into the house, took another piece of bark, held it before the sleeper's face, removed the one stained with his own breath, and replaced it with that containing the sorcerer's.

Before dawn the next morning, the sorcerer, ignorant of the substitution, took the bone and left the house. The youth had been watching and followed him to the edge of the sea, where he laid his bundle in a hole in the rocks through which the rising tide was sending up a miniature water-spout. The sorcerer went away at once, giving the lad an opportunity to remove the bone and secrete it in another cavity. He knew that the wicked man would soon become ill and would suspect that someone had tampered with the bone. So it proved. As the water whirled the bark containing his exhaled breath, the sorcerer began to feel light-headed and rushed off to the hole in the rocks. Meanwhile the invented victim had summoned his neighbours to watch what might transpire. The men searched frantically, but of course could not find the bone, so, as the water rose and covered the bark, he was impelled to plunge repeatedly beneath the surge, until he was drowned.

THE OUTWITTING OF A SORCERER

Over one hundred years ago there was living in Qwaqa is a powerful chief who owned a salmon-weir. Though an expert fisherman himself, he relied to a great extent on the assistance of a commoner who was still more efficient. One summer this man died suddenly. Immediately after the funeral, the chief cancelled his trap, removed the fish, and returned home, physically weary from his labour and more than ever regretting the loss of his assistant. For some season he could win sleep, so, after waiting for an hour or more, he decided to gather firewood. There was a low-rising full moon, so he had no difficulty in seeing his road as he climbed the small mountain behind the village, carrying only an axe with him. He had cut a bundle and was ready to return when he heard a groaning sound as though someone with a heavy burden were climbing the slope. Peering down his hill, he hid himself in such a position that clear moonlight shone upon the path. After waiting a few minutes, he saw a figure approaching; it was Dwqanah, a local shaman, carrying a coffin upon his back. Now thoroughly suspicious, the chief decided to follow, crouching to his axe for protection.

Dwqanah passed over the crest, descended the other side, and then ascended the slope of the mountain on the sea, in long sequence to hide his course. The chief had no difficulty in following him unobserved, and finally watched his conspiring guide put down the coffin and clear away the brush-wood. He seemed to be lifting something, which was followed by a groaning sound as if a large stone was being dragged across another; then he disappeared from sight and the chief realized that Dwqanah had descended into an underground house of which the combination door and smoke-vent had been covered with moss and small sticks.

The chief crawled to the entrance and looked within. Round the walls were ranged the corpses of all those who had died recently in the village, and Dogmed was removing the body of the expert fakeman from its coffin. He put it in line with the others and put on a dance-apron decorated with human finger and toe nails. Then he began to dance, at the same time pressing the lever of a mechanical contrivance which caused the corpses to bow time with sticks and moss to hop into the air as mercurially as do living singers. It was most weird and uncanny, but after watching for a few minutes, the chief was bored to laugh. Although this was the first intimation to Dogmed that he was being observed, he betrayed no surprise and invited the laughter to come down the ladder into his house. The chief did so, and he was received in a courteous and hospitable manner by his host who frankly admitted that he was a sorcerer, and added that his corpses were just dancing to welcome the new arrival. He showed his guest everything of interest in the dwelling, including a box containing potent medicine in which was had the skin of a man's left hand. He explained that he frequently took this to the village and, if he desired to kill anyone, would place within the palm a roll of cedar-bark on which his victim had breathed, then close the fingers upon it. This caused death almost instantly. The chief, though hourly increased, never relaxed his vigilance for a moment, knowing that the sorcerer would not have been so communicative unless he had full confidence of his ability to kill his house. Towards morning, Dogmed suggested that they return home, picked up the skinned hand, and was the first to climb the ladder, intending to stun the chief when his head appeared over the surface. His partner followed close on his heels and finally, as the top of the ladder, turned the sorcerer with his hand so that he sprawled on the ground and the chief was able to emerge with safety. Unprovoked by this few fellow, Dogmed covered the sorcerer to his house so carefully that a man might have passed over it without suspecting its presence. The sorcerer warned the chief to precede him homewards, for the latter was no coward for any such subterfuge and insisted upon following close on the heels of the malefactor. They did not separate until they reached the village, where each proceeded to his own house.

Although this account is supposed to be a literal record of a comparatively recent incident, some of a supernatural type have obviously been added. The man who told the story did not seem to realize the difficulty of a mechanical contrivance to make corpses bow time, nor did it strike him that the sheet of unknown music have been adapted from the similar ceremony performed by ghosts. The whole story was related as an actual one but one of a supernatural nature.

The chief knew that his life was serious danger although he had 539 was the first round. Consequently instead of lying down to sleep, he 754 seated himself with his arms stretched out before him on a box and his head supported on them so that he could watch through his fingers. As he expected, Onqusuk soon came creeping in, holding a tuft of undyed cedar-bark. He made no movement, even when the sorcerer held this before his face and stole away with it when it had been breathed upon. The brave man knew that his life would be in constant danger unless he could catch his enemy and that it was his opportunity. He waited for about one hour, then quietly stored Onqusuk's house where the sorcerer was sleeping peacefully, thinking that all danger was over, and the bear-skin was lying in place upon a box. The chief stealthily took a tuft of cedar-bark, held it before a sleeper's nose till it was impregnated with his breath, and then placed it within the skin from which he withdrew the piece already there. Having accomplished his purpose, he returned home without disturbing a sleeper.

The chief knew that Onqusuk would wash the following morning if he intended to kill, so he remained awake and was watching the sorcerer's house before daybreak. As he expected, the malefactor presently appeared, carrying his chamber-vessel and went to the river. First he cleansed himself with urine and waded in up to his knees, remained for a few minutes, and came ashore again. The second time, he waded in until the water was up to his thighs; the third time, he went on till it was shoulder-deep. Sorcerers always act in this way in order that the four parts of the body shall be covered ceremonially, although no one knows why this should be done by them one. The hidden chief knew that Onqusuk would meet disaster when he bathed for the fourth time since the skin, carried beneath his arm, would then be beneath the surface for a few moments. So it happened. He dipped his head, but instead of being able to raise it, his face remained below the surface, and he remained in that position, slowly drowning. This was the fate which he had destined for the chief whom he had placed within his skinned bear, but he was unaware of the activation which, of course, re-acted upon himself.

The watcher hastily roused his neighbours who came running to the beach half-clad and rubbing their eyes. They brought ashore the corpse of the drowned man while the chief recounted all that he had seen and done during the night. As it was so was sufficiently light a number of men accompanied him to the underground house in the mountains from which the bodies were brought for and adorned by their relatives. Previous to this time, no one had reported Onqusuk of sorcery, but as soon as the discovery was made, hungry people slew all his relatives except an infant daughter. She grew up, married, and was the mother of the old Bella Coola, about seventy years of age in 1923, who is so feared as a sorcerer. It is he who has the collection of spittle, and it is believed that, like his grandfather, he is the owner of a skinned and stuffed left hand with which he can kill a man as surely as with a rifle.

THE DISCOVERY OF TWO SORCERERS

Many years ago there lived at Ilmo two young men who were constant companions; they always hunted and travelled together, and were determined to share each other's fortune, no matter what it might be. One day they agreed to go up the valley to visit some friends, but decided to postpone their departure until dusk. One of the two went out for a short walk and failed to return by the time appointed; his comrade sought him everywhere and finally hurried off up the trail, thinking that his friend must have started before him. He soon heard sounds of laboured breathing as if people were carrying a heavy burden, and could just distinguish two men carrying a coffin on poles between them. He realized that they must be sorcerers and that their inability to turn around would give him an advantage. Stealing up behind them, he pushed the rear man, not only causing him to stumble, but the one in front as well, since their burden was resting between them. Neither could turn around to see who had discovered them, and they became more and more terrified as the brave youth first pushed, and then pulled the one in the rear. Suddenly he called out, ow, so loudly in their ears that the sudden start expelled their spirits and they fell to earth as if dead. The lad watched their gradual recovery, feeling confident that his partner must be within ear-shot and would come hurrying back to his assistance if necessary. As soon as the sorcerers had revived, one of them said angrily to the boy:

[774]

"You will die presently."

"No," he answered. "It is you who are in grave peril."

At this point he called loudly for his companion who was so far ahead that he could barely hear the other's voice; he answered the shout and began to run back. The sorcerers, trying to make the best of a bad situation, mocked him by advising him to call again and to bring more helpers if he wanted to escape death. When his friend had come so close that he could see what was taking place, the youth called out to him:

"Partner! They say that I am in danger."

"No," the other answered. "It is they who will die."

When he joined the group the four began to discuss what was to be done. The sorcerers begged their discoverers not to expose their sin-dainga, and offered to make them members of the hamat society in return for their silence. Though uninitiated persons, even this tempting bribe was refused by the two youths. Next, each of the malefactors offered a daughter as wife to each of the partners, and they accepted this bargain. For their part, the sorcerers were glad to escape at any cost, since they had been caught red-handed; they knew that henceforth they would have to assist their captors, but this was preferable to exposure.

The two groups parted company; the boys continued their journey to the upper village and the sorcerers went on their way to some cave in the mountains. Within a few weeks, each youth married the daughter of one of the malefactors, with whose assistance they were able to give potlatches and become influential personages.

A FAMILY OF KWATNA SORCERERS

Near the village of Kwatna there used to be two cemeteries. One was on a small point of ground at the mouth of the river which becomes an island at high tide; here were interred the bodies of chiefs alone, a custom said to be without parallel on the coast. It is not known why there should have been this special burial-ground, but the place was always spoken of as "The Chiefs' Island." Instead of being buried, coffins containing commoners were laid on ledges of rock at the base of a cliff behind the village; this custom, though unusual, is known elsewhere on the coast, at Kitamaat and Port Simpson, for example.

[714

Many generations ago, there was a time when the corpses of commoners frequently disappeared from the ledges on which they had been placed, and although it was believed that a sorcerer was responsible, no one knew whom to blame. One old woman had lost nearly all her numerous relatives when she realized that, though there had been many deaths in the village and some families had been almost wiped out, no members of one group had been taken. This caused her suspicions; she now noticed that whenever anyone was sick, four brothers of the family in question always made some plausible excuse to leave the village and proceed up the other arm of the inlet. She concluded that this could be no mere coincidence, the four must be sorcerers. Within a short while, another of her relatives fell ill and died in spite of all that could be done; this reduced her family to herself and her infant. On the day after the funeral, the four brothers said that they wanted to gather hemlock boughs and set off in a canoe up the other arm of the inlet for the purpose. They did not come back at night and the villagers assumed that they had been delayed and had camped. The bereaved woman, however, who had hidden herself below the village, saw the brothers paddle back around the ●534 754 point and covered their canoe beneath a leafy tree instead of landing at the village. More suspicious than ever, she followed the four and was able to keep in touch with them in spite of the necessity of carrying her baby. They went to the cemetery, placed the coffin on poles, and two of them carried it away with the others in close attendance.

The mother, still clutching her child, followed the brothers up the side of a steep mountain behind Kwatna. They avoided all trails and travelled in zigzags until they reached the base of a precipice where a tall tree was growing. The mother, who was not far behind, could see that its upper branches grew across to touch the cliff at a point where the mouth of a cave was visible. The coffin was placed on the ground, three of the brothers climbed the tree, and passed from it into the opening in the rock. From this they shoved out a plank to form a narrow bridge to the upper trunk, and dropped a long rope which the one below fastened around the coffin; then it was hauled up, the fourth brother climbed the tree and all disappeared from sight. The woman continued to remain in hiding, but before long her curiosity was piqued by seeing smoke drift out from the opening. She decided that she must see what was taking place, so she moved her infant to keep it quiet, and then began the ascent. Without difficulty she reached a point from which she could peer within, and saw the four melting down the grease from the dismembered body of her kinsman. They were sorcerers without doubt, and she noted that they were preserving with care all the fat that resulted from the inside of the display. Each was wearing a mask, but she was able to recognize them by their figures.

When the primitive decoction had been prepared, the sorcerers left caleep, still wearing their masks. Made bold by her longing for revenge, the woman crept across the plank without disturbing the dampers. Cautiously she picked up the spoon which they had used for stirring the mixture, lifted a few drops to it and held it to the mouth of the one whom she recognized as the oldest brother. He did not stir. With a quick, firm pressure she cramped upon his stomach, causing him to wake and swallow with a gasp; the poison was so potent that he died without making a sound. She took another spoonful of the brew and gave it to the second sorcerer in the same way and with the same result, and in this way killed all four. Stopping only to fill a receptacle with the brew, the woman climbed down the tree and hurried back to Kwatna.

Instead of describing what she had seen and done, the woman determined to wipe out the relatives of the sorcerers. So she invited the whole village to a feast, allotting the proper place to each family. This whole procedure was unusual because she had killed no large game, but there is always a good deal of latitude allowed in such matters, particularly as everyone sympathized with the hostess on account of her many bereavements. Her only assistant was a woman who, like herself, had lost all her kinsmen. The food provided was hemlock-bark dipped in fish-oil, but the hostess contrived that every relative of the sorcerer should receive a portion dipped in poison instead. They all started to eat at the same time, and all fell dead simultaneously without a word.

Instantly wild confusion broke out and the guests exclaimed that they were being served poison. Unperturbed, the woman explained everything; how she had first become suspicious, how she had followed the four brothers, and all that had resulted. A party set out at once under her guidance and found that everything she had said was true. In this way perished all the relatives of the sorcerer except one man who happened to be absent at the time. One of his descendants is now living in Bella Coola and is regarded with a certain amount of suspicion, although there is no evidence that he or any of his relatives have practised sorcery for generations.

A BELLA COOLA SORCERER

Since the introduction of modern, there death in the lower Bella Coola valley a shaman, Ancaithatcum-ah by name, he was a regular practitioner, able both to heal the sick or to cause death. When using his power beneficially, he drank a cattle containing a rock-crystal, but when he was requested to kill, he used one that appeared to be identical but contained human teeth and nail frogs. In some unknown manner these were lost, which prevented him from slaying a man as requested by the chiefs of his village. One April day he mentioned his difficulty casually to a certain Tyhlo who surprised him by replying:

"I can supply you with teeth and you will have greater power than ever."

The two were alone at the time and Tyhlo, having admitted that he was a sorcerer, suggested that they form a partnership. He must have felt confident that Ancaithatcum-ah would agree, as indeed he did gladly. Tyhlo explained that the necessary knowledge had been handed down to his family for generations, but that he had only recently begun to use it to avenge a slight or a feast of ashes.

Next morning Tyhlo guided Ancaithatcum-ah up the mountain on the north side of the extreme head of North Bentinck Arm, just west of the Nuskumcumany River. Shamans frequently ranged over this area, but no one had ever seen a sorcerer's lair there. Tyhlo led the way to a small rock shelter beneath which was concealed a chest about eight feet long. He kicked it four times with his left foot, and called out four times:

"Wake up!"

Tylle then raised the cover, and his companion saw that it contained a number of separate compartments, formed by varied strips criss-crossing within, and that the whole bottom was covered with a thick, black, oily liquid. On top of the cube-like divisions lay a badly decomposed corpse which Smashkalamain-ski recognized as that of a youth who had disappeared from the village the previous July and who was thought to have been drowned. Tylle explained the mechanism of the box: Each section was for a different disease, stomach trouble in one, heart failure in another, consumption in a third, sudden death in a fourth, and so on. Whenever he wanted to cause a specific disease, he would dip a personal possession of the victim's in the oil at the bottom of the proper compartment and leave it there. All that was then necessary to improve the patient's condition was to raise the article slightly in the liquid, whereas to lower it increased the force of the malady, and to leave it covered entirely caused death. It was generally known that such methods were used by sorcerers, but this was the first box that Smashkalamain-ski had ever seen and he was heavily interested. He inquired as to purpose of the boy's body, and Tylle replied that he had killed him with the intention of taking his skin to use against the lad's relatives, but had been forced to carry away the whole body owing to the difficulty of removing the skin alone. Whenever he wanted to kill a person quietly and rapidly, it was only necessary to lay an article which had belonged to the victim on the back of the neck of the corpse. Death resulted immediately, since this was the spot where the spirit had resided during life. After answering his friend's questions, Tylle handled several to the horror of the boy and then took a number of well made which he gave to the-wicked Smashkalamain-ski. Then the two went home to their respective villages, after promising each other mutual support and secrecy.

Although the two medicine-men took every precaution not to be seen together too often, rumours began to circulate that they were partners, and that Tylle was a sorcerer. Others were not aware of this, but the suspected were become so unpopular that he was virtually expelled from his village. More angry than perturbed at this, he moved down with up the valley to the town in which Smashkalamain-ski was living. After waiting for a few weeks to allay suspicion, Tylle determined to murder the chief who had been the prime mover in his expulsion, and sent his son to steal the victim's chamber-pot. His wife discovered the theft the same night and promptly raised the whole village, realizing the danger to her husband if it should fall into the hands of a sorcerer. Diligent search was made, but of course the article could not be found, since the chief had taken it away to his own house. Tylle placed the vessel in a compartment of his box containing a bear's bladder tied into sections; this caused his enemy to suffer stricture and soon to die in agony. 539 754

Following the usual custom, the relatives of the dead man smeared their faces with ashes which they left in position for a year. The widow, who had loved her husband very dearly, allowed this indication of mourning to remain even longer than the customary period. On several occasions Tsilke made somewhat slighting remarks about her excessive grief, and when one of his sons also commented upon it, she became suspicious and told her relatives. One of them was a chief of the village where Tsilke was then living and where he was already regarded with distrust. This man visited the home of his bereaved kinswoman and called the chiefs of her village together to discuss the matter, and to inform them of the suspicions which his conduct had aroused in his new home. Three days later, Tsilke happened to come to the village and was at once summoned to the house where the chiefs had assembled to interrogate him. Tsilke sat on a box in the centre of the group and denied, slowly and positively, that he had any knowledge of sorcery, adding that his poverty confirmed his statement. At this moment Awaxilkaiwaxis-ala came rushing into the house, furiously brandishing a rifle, and exclaiming that it was scandalous the way in which unjust accusations were being levelled at Tsilke. One of the chiefs quietly slipped behind the shaman, knocked his five-arm upwards so that it exploded harmlessly in the air, and threw him to the ground where he threatened him with a large knife.

"I will not brook any interference from you in this matter," he said.

This so frightened Awaxilkaiwaxis-ala that he blurted out that he knew Tsilke was a sorcerer and that he had seen his box containing a decayed human body. Tsilke was less excited than anyone else, and slipped out of the house in the confusion, merely pausing to ask:

"What are you going to do about it?"

He returned to his new village where, of course, the news soon followed of what had been discovered. The chiefs decided that he must be killed, and that the most convenient occasion would be at a feast of souls which was to take place in the near future. Tsilke accepted an invitation to this and was alone while he was busy handling his spoon. One of his sons was killed with him, another who escaped through a hole in the floor was slaughtered near the village. His two brothers were absent on a hunting expedition, but a party tracked them and slew them in their camp before they knew that their evil deeds had been found out. Tsilke's two daughters were allowed to live, but were given to a famous warrior who kept them practically as prisoners. Awaxilkaiwaxis-ala, who seems to have escaped all punishment for his share in the affair, guided a party to the sorcerer's box. It was found to be old and worm-covered, obviously 539 754

Taboos

914 The Bella Coola regard as taboos those injunctions that are observed in the belief that their neglect would cause automatic punishment. The mechanism of enforcement is frequently not understood; it is enough to know that an unpleasant result would follow disobedience. Some taboos are in force at all times, others only during certain seasons of the year, and still others at critical periods of life. Since the psychology of such [789] beliefs is essentially magical rather than religious, they could justifiably be grouped at this point. Unfortunately, to do so would destroy the continuity of accounts of birth, adolescence, death, ceremonial chastity, and many other aspects of Bella Coola life subject to taboo. The injunctions enforced by the River Guardian, the restrictions observed by a girl after puberty, the continence required after different medicines, all are taboos, disregard of which brings certain punishment. These and many others have already been described in connection with the activities to which they pertain. It is doubtful whether the Bella Coola have a single word to describe taboos [785] in general, though they are all regarded as cuaide, that is, as something which is ceremonially unclean.

Scarcely to be distinguished from taboos are ceremonial errors, yee-imat or kite-imat. Failure to give presents to hereditis when a seat breaks beneath a chief or a dancer stumbles, or ceremonial activity during the year's waiting for the fruition of supernatural good fortune are ritual mistakes of this type. Neglect of such regulations brings punishment, though of a lesser kind than the breaking of taboos. If the [288] [208] error has been in connection with a ceremony, the offence can be wiped out by presents to hereditis, and the terms yee-imat and kite-imat are likewise applied to some of their prerogatives such as the ability to claim clothing during the marriage of a chief's child.

Most taboos and errors can best be described with other theoretically, every Navajo should know the origin myth of his prerogative, these are rarely remembered, a state of affairs differing entirely from that with respect to ancestral origin myths. An ancestor of Hashkinaxwu is supposed to have seen Nightwind, decorated with the tails of two eagles stuck in his hair. The following myth was obtained of the origin of Kaxwinai's prerogative. [334]

In the beginning there came down to Mount Pin-dzon, a small mountain on the south side of the Bidis Ceda River about three-quarters of a mile from the spa, Hitsinaxwinai, his younger brother Naqaxhiskin, and their sister. Hgoxdzo had given them a medal horse, or medal that is was possible, but which could change to any one at their wish. It was called Hgoxdzo, a name they borrowed also on their sister. They brought the medal designation, Kaxwinai, with the right to perform a dance. The party, including Raven, who was like a son to Hitsinaxwinai, came down from their mountain say looking for a place to settle. As people were already living at Spaqo and Hgoxdzo, they chose Ditsil as their home.

From this place the three could hear the beating of drums, as the people of the adjacent villages performed their twice-dance and Raven determined that his companions should not lack the privilege which others enjoyed. Accordingly he flew down the hill where he saw Nightwind, where he obtained as power for Hitsinaxwinai. This prerogative was embodied in the name Kaxwinai, which is still in use.[1]

The prerogative of seeing Nightwind is known as Ashdlah-dzin, "The Comet," or "The Eye-Comet." It will be convenient to refer to the person who has this power as X. As already described, if he had been initiated during the preceding ceremonial season, he is now obliged to dance. In later years, if he wishes to do so, he first consults the medicinals, and if they consent he begins his preparations during the summer. Among other matters, X informs the singers of his intentions and they begin to compose songs. Occasionally they re-use one from a previous year, but to do this is to admit lack of creative ability. The usual practice is to compose new songs and to allege to them words bearing on the proper theme, sometimes including

[The Dance of Wild]

The last to see himself is Ewilim Tachinyan, an obstreperous individual, who always wants more presents than anyone else. When X announces that the beings above have taken their places, a sequence brings forward the object covered with cedar-bark and painted with a design of Kwocumdidzis.* Bella is above X's head, and then given it to a herald who runs it into the fire. At the same time X dances on the floors some dried cedar-bark, some undried cedar-bark, a little eagle down, and some chicken grouse, saying:

"Those Kwocumdidzis,* accept this offering and be pacified," and throws his hands up in the air as if casting some object upwards.

Still dancing, X calls out hoi! several times.

The painted representation and the cedar-bark are objects which Kwocumdidzis likes to receive; the chicken grouse supplies the feces on which they ascend to him. The same procedure is repeated for the eight other brothers, with slight variations in the words addressed to each. To Gaxpemidzilas, for example, X says:

[134] Gaxpemidzilas
Wunkpachas-ulkwaxa?*
Gaxpemidzilas
Gaxpemidzilas.* | Kwocumdidzis,
to the place where he sits, | wulgwaxa-ulal,
the sculpture?*

When the time comes to invite the hungry Dzu-qualiis to an offering of food instead of bark to cast upon the flames, X continues to dance after the food gift, and presently a dead is heard on the roof while some burial, chosen beforehand for the purpose, compresses a hidden blackfish-effigy which the spectators know to be the voice of the soul. Whether they be

[The Cannibal Dance]

X, now almost nude, rushes around the house, shouting ooo, ooo, ooo, while his call sounds loudly, as the whistle is pressed firmly towards his mouth or against his cheek, and under a lash. Often the Initiator slip a rope over his shoulders to prevent him escaping again. Finally, he rushes from the house and all the Initiator crowd close about him on the sidewalk without. As many as possible press upwards against his body with their heads, while they shout, yet trying to equal the call upwards. On the fourth repetition X is supposed to have been driven forth, and in answer to the tumultuous shout of the Initiator, there is heard the sound of a whistle from above. The uninitiated do not know that a Initiator has been dispatched with one to a mountain peak for this purpose.

The Initiator now return to X's house for a meal. The first dish of food is placed before X himself, while one of the non-dish attendants him and the audience in the following events:

Nanaqilanu, [illegible]
Gwalaga, [illegible] (the Cannibal)[illegible]
Wa, [illegible] Pawa. [illegible]
Wara, [illegible] Pawa.* [illegible]

There is no ritual significance attached to any particular words, inasmuch as does even disposition as to what they are, but the above may be considered a fair example of the kind of remarks addressed to a Cannibal at his first meal. After X has started eating, the other Initiator commence and the non-dish deliver their usual admonitions, praising X for what he has done and urging others to emulate his example. Then presents are distributed to those who have been blind.

It is considered that a Cannibal complimentes a man by taking a piece of his flesh, and that he is under obligations to the man thus for the latter having allowed him to exercise his prerogative.

Literally means "The Greater Dog" or "The Further Dog." X is a small [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of this.

Literally [illegible] of the following Cannibal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] type of [illegible] can be carried out only during the ceremonial season.

After killing and eating a human being, a Cannibal must conceal himself for a considerable period, sometimes as long as four years. The uninitiated are told that the great power within him has taken him so far into the upper regions that one or more years must elapse before his return. During this time he can be seen only by Initiates. The writer was told of one unfortunate corpse-eating Cannibal, Kibaiko, who was virtually secluded for eight years, since a crime was seen on his last every time he reappeared, thus forcing him to kill and eat. This name had been dormant for a number of years until conferred on the writer, who failed to uphold the prerogative.

One other type of Cannibal prerogative remains to be described, namely, that of killing oneself. This is even less common than that of corpse-eating, being enjoyed only by two individuals, Kalimabuay of Dasi and Dwing of the Kimagan River. The following account of the origin of the latter's prerogative was obtained.

The men were able to steal away without being observed and Tsa'ukhila told Qilemas to say nothing about what they had seen. A little later he gave a dance in which he wore a wolf's mask and pretended to eat dog-flesh. His neighbours, ignorant of the reason for which this dance had been required, were considerably impressed.

Another exploit of Tsa'ukhila and Qilemas may here be recorded, although it is unconnected with the Cannibal dance.

One night when they were spearing fish, a house suddenly arose before them. Qilemas, startled and terrified, began to cry, but Tsa'ukhila quieted him.

"I am master here," he said. "We are in this adventure together and your task is to keep quiet."

Then a house appeared before them from the depths of the ocean. It was really a qimmirt, with no function much as doorway, and though Tsa'ukhila naturally knew it was, he climbed to the roof, so that he could pass within through what corresponded to a smoke-vent. The house was filled with valuables of all kinds, guarded only by gulls. Tsa'ukhila coaxed inside with his gulls, hurled forth one object after another and strung each across to be thrown on the mainland to hide in a cave. Unfortunately, a cave happened to draw near, whereupon the house slowly sank back into the depths.

* 575 776 551 Function might have be made of a Sisaok repository, said to be unique in Bella Coola, that contains five Cannibal masks. It is in the form of a human being with a tail, bending and bent forward so that hands and head touch the ground. A repository is at each point of contact. The masks are:

In this repository there lives a mikqan with a copper lining to its mouth.

* 575 * 776 424 551 It will be seen that these myths help but little to explain the Bartal society, or even the origin of the Cannibal dances; they appear to be only rationalizations attempting to account for established customs. For this reason they have been interred after a description of the Cannibal dance.

shows; of sitting in one of the back corners and receiving the best food as usual meals; of paying those on whom they exercise their prerogative, and of liability to forfeit an equal of strangers. This last prerogative, if it may be so termed, lasts for the ceremonial season, and in the case of a novice, for the following summer as well. Moreover, Breakers do not destroy the goods of fellow-Breakers, Sometlem, or Cannibals.

In view of the similarity of this rite to those already described, no effort was made to collect full details. Different Breakers have minor variations in ritual, similar to those already illustrated. The following is an account of the manner in which the Breaker, Spit of Death, performed the rite a number of years ago. As on previous occasions, it will be convenient to use the possessive case, and to refer to the dancer as X. Spit gave the following account of the origin of his prerogative.

Long, long ago, soon after the first people had come to this earth, a marriage was about to take place in the village of Snaiqut. At that distant period the people were so powerful that they could themselves return their dead, and the bridegroom determined to be a witness of the event. He chose to witness the return of Snaiqumalth, Hyamtsa, one of Hyamtsa's guns, whom he remembered having seen throwing stones in his father's house before he, the bridegroom, was born in this world.* When goods were piled up ready for distribution as marriage presents, the men began to hold some wrestling, one of them dislocated from a log, overall his bride and killed her. This unfortunate accident solved the question of his name, as he universal consent it was decided that he should be called, Spit, 'He of the Dislocated Hip.'

Since that time a lot has been achieved that an Breaker may dance a call-songs successfully during his dance, and the novitiate would not also disclose his injunction. The Breaker sits the dance with a number of Bellacoolas, a dance not matter (the fall is explicit the tradition, the man, and is that the novitiate do not see him use a stone, even as a religious dog, the usual reason for doing so in Bella Coola.

When X wishes to dance he must first obtain the consent of the novitiate in the usual manner. He also arranges with Bellacoolas to have bones and other wooden objects placed within dangerous. Unless he is removed to his hollow down we will die you."

The other uninitiated marvel that any of their number should be held enough to move the ballacim, ignorant of the fact that those who do so are really spirits whose part in the performance has long since been arranged by the mandals. Instances are remembered when the member or copper frame was dislocated and the performer was killed; in such a case the spirit actually slew one or more ballacim to preserve the prestige of the society. Exact details were unobtainable, but it seems clear that the victims were selected with the aid of the mandals during the night; they were, of course, men of little importance in the community.

The spirit prevent anyone from leaving the house and greatly the die selection, except for the common wailing of the women, particularly X's relatives. The ballacim, granted a respite until dawn, allow some of the uninitiated to come forward and pass curtain around the fire to see the corpse of X with the bloody crescent exposed. At this juncture, the old women selected for the purpose sing the mourning song, of which the words and tune never vary; they are believed to have been handed down from time immemorial. The dance is of Intermediate a, a kindly supernatural woman[1] who returns to life ballacim killed in the performance of their rites. The singer in the upper, eastern, rear corner of the house sings the following words:

Pierceyou[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Perhaps you[2] are correctly[3]	[illegible]	[illegible]

[5] [illegible]

After a short interval, she is announced by the singer in the [illegible] western, rear corner of the house as follows:

[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

The general meaning of this song is obvious, although there are several obscure expressions which serve to increase the wonder and fear of the uninitiated. Silence follows the singing, then whistling is heard and a herald announces that one of the puppet-persons named Ano Ñ has left him and gone to the region above. Similar whistling announces the departure of others at intervals. When several have gone up, it is time for the first to return. A drum, made by a hidden accomplice, is heard on the roof and whistling heralds our arrival. Sometimes the puppet-person returns to Ñ, but more often it is invisible, and the mantlemen previously secured is removed from the back of the dancer who continues to be an Ñ'Ghiba. Now and then the uninitiated are invited forward to look at him and they notice that the gaping mouth is slowly closing, as may occur in a savage in the dim light of the house. In intervals the puppet-persons go and return from the land above, and the proceedings are sometimes enlivened by the comic selling a bundle, who in turn informs the audience, after the puppet-persons are on to journey shift. Usually each goes and returns four times in the course of the night. Each of the women selected to sing the mourning songs performs once, standing in a corner of the house and moving a wand around with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cotton-cloth. In the long night process. Towards dawn continuous whistling is heard. This is made by several men with a whistle apiece, and begins to blow as soon as the breath of his partner is nearly exhausted. It is known as the voice of Ostromdo or Ñ'Ghiba, but not to Bahe Cinda, this is the signal for the entry of the giant toad. Carpenters have made a wooden figure of the amphibian and by means of concealed strings it is

[illegible]

On the night of [illegible] a herald summons the Initiates to ☿'s house with the cry:

[illegible] [994]

This is merely a rhetorical remark since the dance is really one of major importance. They dance, and are at once given a small meal.* Then the cry is raised for the uninitiated. When they are assured, ☿ appears from the back room, carrying before him the fungus, held by the shorter end of rope projecting above, while the longer is coiled up behind a row of eights. The Initiates begin to bear down furiously as ☿ slowly circles the fire. Then, solemnly and carefully, he sets the fungus on the floor where, to the wonder of the uninitiated, it disappears from sight as though it had sunk into the plinths. This is, in fact, the case, since the carpenters have prepared a small hole in the floor through which it disappears, leaving only the cord hung on the surface. Four four Initiated men are called forward to support ☿ and assist, two on either side of him. The dancer bends down, picks up the string easily with one hand and draws up the fungus into sight, taking care not to raise it high enough to expose the longer end of the rope passing through the hole. He lowers his burden and the fungus disappears from sight. ☿ whispers to one of his four assistants and the latter calls out, as if just prompted:

*This may be also a sacred banquet.

land of the salmon early in January, and it is owing to his successful visit that there is a plentiful supply of fish the following year. The fact that the Bella Coola attribute the same function to Nankipaum provides no difficulties to native philosophers.

"Different individuals have different stories," they say, and the fact that the two are contradictory is a matter of no consequence.

The incidents described in the following myth are always spoken of as having taken place long ago, and yet the coming of S'ioaiow is an annual event, a confusion disconcerting to the investigator though not to the Bella Coola themselves.

S'ioaiow[*] once led a raiding party against the salmon, whose home is far to the west, and against the herrin who live in a far and warm country beyond even the land of salmon. His crew consisted of birds who are spoken of in the myth by unusual designations, and to be either their supernatural or their tribal names. One informant spoke of these beings as individuals, and only added that they were birds as we understand, while another emphasized their avian rather than their human characteristics. This is not surprising, considering that the story belongs to the distant past when birds and human beings were not as clearly differentiated as they now are. S'ioaiow's crew consisted of:

The Bald Eagle, Tsilmaxi;
The Hawk (?) species, Sunkaxiwaix;
The Raven, Tsemaqaiaix, "He Who Talks to Dawn and Welcome Everyone";
The Water Ouzel, Tilmaxwilidin, "The Walking Owl";
The Great Blue Heron, Skaxnilim, "Long Shank";
The Hummingbird, Ahl'yaix;
The Cormorant, Kaulaxilla, who joined the expedition as Bella Bella as a passenger;
Four lazy supernatural beings, Tsaxnilxi.

The expedition was under the special protection of Kalaxa, a female supernatural shaman, who guided the canoe in which the raiders travelled by the force of her incantations as if it had been a compass. After a lengthy journey, the party reached the land of the salmon where the chiefs astrologer drifted low in the heavens so that the fish could see their fish. Each of the crew captured a different kind of salmon which, in the myth, we referred to by their supernatural names. 773

[The Dance of Winning]

The Bald Eagle captured the spring salmon, Ohuldana, "The One that Changes Itself," a reference to the two forms in which this fish appears before and after spawning. 824 825 539

The Hawk captured the sockeye salmon, Hanuldanna, "The One that Preserves in the Head of the River."

The Raven captured the hump-back salmon, Ankipanin, "The One that Fills the River."

The Water Owl captured the dog salmon, Spatsina, "The Maker of Good Weather," a reference to the calm weather in August when this fish spawns.

The Great Blue Heron captured the silver salmon, Kyapatsanulin, "The One that Makes Us Fat."

The Cormorant captured a variety of dog salmon, Ocipan, for the Bolla Bolla.

The Hermaphrodite was also successful and filled the enormous basket which he had brought for the purpose with a large number of heavy captives.

As soon as the raiders had achieved their purpose they returned to Bolla Coolu and released their booty; since that time there has been an abundance of salmon in the river and of herons on the hills. The Cormorant left the canoe at Bolla Bolla and released the dog salmon there; that is why this variety of fish has since been plentiful at Bolla Bolla.

Several Bolla Coolu kokwisi have a dance prerogative of which the above is origin myth. The details vary slightly, and some informants stated frankly that they had forgotten the names of the bird crew. The reasons given for the use of Wiwanise as patron likewise vary. According to one account, in the beginning of time Mapoonin placed the name Nanachomai in a repository near the summit of the lofty Mount Ba, near Itsan. He had two reasons for so doing: he did not wish it to be defiled by passersby breaking dust into it with their feet, and he wished the owner of the name to be the first to see the return of Wiwanise. The repository is a small pond, which can move from place to place, but, being itself supernatural, is visible only to those who have purified themselves. Since that time whoever has had the name Nanachomai has had the kwisi prerogative of using Wiwanise. 424 773 778 [776]

the uninitiated are expelled. If several kokaciw in the same village are prestigis of Thunder, each makes a circuit independently, but they agree to meet afterwards in the house of one of their number. There all members of the society assemble for a meal provided hurriedly by X, or to a number of meals if several have Thunder as patron; in this case there is no pooling of food. The marshals take the opportunity of giving their customary admonitions, as if it were midwinter. Next the singers combine their ideas and beat out a new song of which the theme is Thunder who never rests, it is worded as if X were speaking and describing what his patron is doing. This song is sung and sinung until all present have learnt both tune and words. If there are several kokaciw with Thunder as patron, a song is made for each and practised in the same manner.

When all is ready, one of the heralds calls in the uninitiated. Each song is sung to the accompaniment of beating sticks while a dancer performs. Instead of X, this is an old man or woman who has not had a call for many years. Often the kocia selected is so old that he or she can dance only with the support of a stick; no reason could be learnt for this surprising deviation from the usual practice. If several songs have been composed, a new dancer performs to each. After the last dance the uninitiated are expelled and the kokaciw soon follow. Since no call has come, it follows that it is of a ceremonial, though not of a sacred nature, and does not take the regular course of winter dances. It is said to "make good the path of Thunder," the term employed being identical with that used for the dance on unknown after the burning of the masks.

Nothing more need be said about the Thunder dance, except to give the following origin myth:

Long ago, long before the white man came to this land, but still longer after the first settlement, four brothers left Kimapsin to hunt mountain goats on Mount Pragaldin, near the Kimapsin River.* It was September,

*This mountain is also known as Sharp-back Salmon Mountain, but shape suggests that hill in question and it is said that long ago, in the very beginning of time, a salmon became petrified there.

the goats were plentiful, fat, and unsuspicious, so that before nightfall they had killed four. Well satisfied, they lay down in a cave to sleep for the night. At that time no one knew what supernatural being caused thunder; the earliest inhabitants of the world had possessed that knowledge but it had been forgotten in the intervening generations. Towards midnight the hunters were awakened by a loud boom and wondered what could have caused it. Presently they saw approaching a figure resembling a man, with a weird nonhuman face, who carried in each hand a huge rock crystal.* He raised and lowered his arms as if pounding; at each movement the crystals struck each other, producing the booming sound and also emitting a flash of light. The eldest brother, Sadu, told the others to cover their faces with their blankets and to keep their eyes closed, because some evil and powerful creature was drawing near. But the second brother, who had caught a glimpse of the two crystals and greatly desired them, watched cautiously, hoping for an opportunity to steal them. Thunder, for it was none other, ranged around; at intervals he passed across to the other side of the intervening valley on a sidewalk which grew before his feet to form a bridge for him, and on it, too, he was able to retrace his steps. Several times Thunder crossed and recrossed, accompanied by reverberating peals. He came near the four brothers and danced; then lay down while fire emerged from his mouth. The second brother began to feel scorched, gradually the heat increased, but he was powerless to move; before dawn, when Thunder vanished, he had been roasted to death.

The three survivors buried the dead man in a hastily made grave in the floor of the cave and went home, abandoning the mountain goats which they had killed. Sadu, though grieved at the loss of his brother, felt that the latter's death was his own fault for peeking when he had been warned not to do so. Not long afterwards the two younger brothers died. Then the sole survivor told a carpenter to make him a mask secretly, according to a design which he would describe. In this way the face of Thunder was portrayed in wood. When the mask was ready, Sadu wore it and gave an imitation of the actions of his patron; no one had ever seen anything like it and the people were amazed.

No great antiquity is ascribed to this myth and it gives no explanation of questions which at once arise in the investigator's mind. The type is fairly common in Bella Coola; in fact, the only unusual part of it is that the visionary received a dadat prerogative rather than one of the forms of good fortune previously described. To the Bella Coola philosopher, apparently no explanation is needed of the manner in which Saiks was allowed to use his experience as the basis of a kusiut dance. The assumption is that he was a kusiut at the time of his experience, although this is not clearly stated. The last to use the name died about 1910, each Saiks having had the prerogative of giving the Thunder dance.

THE GHOST DANCE[m]

Among the numerous patrons of kusiut dancers are Ghosts. The term, ăskanĕots, applied to a shaman whose power is derived from a ghost, is also applied to kusiut with one as patron, but the two functionaries must not be confused. It is a fairly common prerogative and there are Ghost dancers in every village, their right depending in every case on some experience of an ancestor with a ghost. The following is an account of the manner in which Septes of Tcowatl performed his ritual; it may be regarded as typical of all, and the dancer can be referred to as X.

575* 796* [775] [756] [424]

At any time during the ceremonial season X consults with the marshals to decide upon a suitable time for his performance. On the evening preceding, normally the qatlum of some other kusiut, the marshals state that his call is imminent; X makes his final arrangements and asks the assistance of a number of his fellows.

When the nulusam rites of the following evening have been completed and the uninitiated have returned to their own houses, they are startled to hear whistling from the forest near at hand. It is not the instrumentally produced sound that accompanies the coming of a call, but tuneless whistling with the mouth; everyone knows that this is the language of ghosts. A visitation from them is by no means unknown, and always dreaded, so at once there is excitement and everyone cowers in the bedrooms. Presently heralds go through the village

[The Moon Dance]

*575 No detailed description is needed for the ceremonial on *796 either nusiutâlsap or qatlum. On the evening of the former day 821 the masks are ordered; one for Asiutânem, who appears to be [532] confused with the Moon itself, one for each Aiqwaiust, one for each Snitsmân·a, and one for Ano'likwolsaix.

Late in the afternoon the kukusiut assemble in X's house to see that everything is in good shape. A large mat has been [532] spread across the back wall of the house and on it a disk representing the Moon, with a human face in the middle. After the usual discussion the uninitiated are called in. Each Snitsmân·a remains standing alone in the two back corners of the house, while the two Aiqwaiust are in the central space behind the fire, constantly waving their arms to and fro. Suddenly the Moon itself appears against the matting. A carpenter, concealed behind the screen, directs its course so that it moves in a short arc across the background and disappears; Ano'likwolsaix explains to the uninitiated that this is the track of the new Moon, low down on the horizon. A second time it "rises," and moves across in a longer and higher curve, which Ano'likwolsaix says is the longer orbit of the waxing Moon. On its third course it is still higher, and on its fourth appearance it moves across the full width of the house near the roof, which Ano'likwolsaix describes as the course of the full Moon, far above the mountains. She also explains that we are indebted to Snitsmân·a for cleaning the Moon's face after the Aiqwaiust have blackened it, as otherwise no light would be visible. This ends the spectacle; the uninitiated are sent away, and the ceremonial concludes in the manner already described.

This constitutes the Moon dance as practised during the ceremonial season, but in addition X is required to dance whenever his patron is hidden by an eclipse. On such occasions the ritual is identical with that described for an eclipse of the Sun.

THE DANCE OF THE MURDERED SLAVE

One of the chieftains who came to earth in the beginning of time was Ăliximotussaix, whose wealth was so great that he was able to invite his associates from far and near to potlatches, and thus acquire many sisook names for his only son. Becoming confused with this form of generosity, he decided to institute a faster ceremonial for his child. At that time chiefs were so powerful that they could create their own repositories, and Hiamatsaiais resolved to make his son's in his own house. To give strength to it, he dug a hole and buried alive in it a female slave with her small infant. The unfortunate woman was a member of the tribe known to the Bella Coola as Tsawát, probably a branch of the Haida; like all other northern tribeswomen she wore in her lower lip a plug of abalone-shell. Hiamatsaiais also buried in the hole a large number of the wraps which abounded in his house. The uninitiated were told that the women had chanced to stumble upon a repository and had become Ináxis, "rendered incapable of returning"; from this circumstance she was henceforth known as Anakululeis. The Ináxis also informed nonmembers that the woman had been made immortal, and was forever to remain as a slave in the repository. Hiamatsaiais chose the name Xqáiwa, "Sharp-Sound," for his son, a reference to the sharp hooks of the numerous crests shown on every object in his house. This designation has since been transmitted in the usual manner; every owner has had the right to perform a dance with the buried woman as person.

In describing the ritual it will be convenient to refer to Xqáiwa as X. 575* 796*

When X wishes to dance he obtains permission from the marshals and makes his preliminary plans in the customary way. A suitable date for the coming of the call is chosen, and, on the night preceding, the weeping of Anakululeis is heard in the forest behind the village. The weeper is one of X's associates, but no uninitiated would be reckless enough to venture near. She moves down the valley, as if coming from the repository near the village of Stax. The next evening X receives his call and the uninitiated are expelled from his house. The dancer blackens his face, puts on a ceremonial collar, and goes out alone to find the slave woman; presently he returns, leading Anakululeis by the hand. She is disguised as an old, old woman, clad in rags and carrying on her back a bundle made to represent a small infant; over her face is a mask with a plug of abalone-shell in the lower lip (see Plate 12). She slowly circles the fire, weeping bitterly, while the kukusiut [532] assemble to witness the dance of Hipunim. This is his function in the land above, as it is natural for him to do the same in this world.

THE DANCE OF HIPUNIM'S FOREMAN

Hipunim in the land above has a servant who uses a hand-net, rain, in fishing for his master. He is accordingly known as Hipunim's Foreman, "Fisherman," and is patron for a Iniciat.

THE DANCE OF THE TOP

The playful Ismilkamukh Hipunim has a favourite toy consisting of a stick which can be made to spin between the hands. This top, if it may so be named, is patron for some Iniciat. The writer was unable to learn how it is displayed on ceremony.

THE DANCE OF THE POTSHOTED HAMMER

The patron of one Iniciat is a hammer which in some way was changed to stone in the beginning of time when the Bella Coola River first flowed to the sea.

THE DANCE OF THE GRIZZLY BEAR

A Iniciat named Bilkmi has, as patron, a grizzly bear resident in Symayuw's house.

VARIOUS ORIGIN MYTHS

In most cases Iniciat dances have been preserved until the present day, although the myths on which they depend have long since been forgotten, but the reverse is sometimes the case. The following myths, were recorded with few, or no details of the associated dances. In several cases, one of the same type has already been recorded, so that the significance will be apparent.

A COMPOSITE ORIGIN MYTH[100]

Long ago there lived in Ilnuc a man and his wife who were powerful, prosperous, and able to give their children many good names. This [illegible] around the jealousy of several of the chiefs who caused the death of the couple by means of sorcery. Six children, five boys and one girl, the last the youngest of the family, were then left orphans. No one helped them and they suffered greatly from lack of proper food and clothing, besides being forced to bear unbearable responsibilities and evils. One spring the six went to the forest to gather hemlock bark for food. The oldest boy climbed a tree and threw down pieces of bark which the little girl helped to pick up, as have her brothers all told her how much she was helping, a kindly favor because she was really too young to be of assistance. One piece of bark blew some little distance away; she ran to get it, but in a moment came hurrying back to him, saying that she had seen a strange man clad in a bear-skin blanket, with dried cedar-bark and eagle down in his hair. At first the five brothers did not believe her, but at length they went to investigate and found the man, as she had described. He was lying on the ground but sat up when they approached.

"I have seen your parents," he said, "and how you have been ill-treated through no fault of your own, but solely owing to the jealousy of the evil-doer chiefs. It was they who killed your parents, but now I give you such power that you will be able to vanquish."

"Your name shall be Nanas," he continued as he turned to the oldest brother. "You shall be a Cannibal. When you dance energetically, instruct someone to cut your stomach vertically and your souls will fall out, trembling. They will return to you as dawn and you will then fully recover, having frightened the uninitiated."

"Your name shall be Sang'mat," he told the second boy. "You, likewise, will be able to have your stomach cut, but you will not be a Cannibal."

"Your name shall be Nagwa," he said to the third brother. "You will have the ability to go to the land above to inspect tally poles. You will be able to forecast the length of a man's life from the condition of his pole, and to cure the sick by straightening those that are leaning."

Turning to the fourth brother he continued:

"Your name shall be qaw. You are to be a ma'a dancer, with power to give food and grease to Owpaxbidze and his brothers in the regions above. On such occasions you will wear a head-dress of branches covered with eagle down."

Then he addressed the fifth and youngest lad, saying:

"Your name shall be uma'a. You will have a Sasiai dance in respect to that designation, but without special ability."

Finally the stranger turned to the little girl and said:

"Your name shall be Qaxlaxda'i. When you dance you will be able to use any one of ten songs and have as patron any supernatural being Qoaiosáo-i moved to and fro among the chiefs as they were busying themselves in preparations for leaving, and drew to herself the spirit of every one of the party. As they pushed off from the shore, she put three [illegible] heard which she set about behind them. It vanished in the five [illegible], increasing the various spirits, and presently the canoes were [illegible] and their occupants all drowned. The six orphans continued to live at Sisaa where they intermarried with the poor people and in time the village increased in population and fully regained its old importance.

This myth has many points of resemblance with those described in vol. I, chap. 10. Each of the six orphans, and especially Qoaiosáo-i, received the boon of supernatural good fortune, but the present given to the five took the form of a hereditary prerogative. The names so received are either in use at the present time or have but recently become dormant. Nacáw was used by the father's brother of the woman who related the story; Sowʷ-mai belongs to her son, a boy about eight years old; Nusem is the property of another youth, related to the family; sáew has been lent to a friend, subject to recall at any time, and Qoaiosáo-i is used by a girl relative about twenty years of age. Each of these has the prerogative of carrying out the dance given to their ancestor at Sisaa, long ago.

ORIGIN MYTH OF THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CARPENTERS[100]

In the beginning Alqaníim went down to a point on the upper reaches of the Clearwater four brothers, Nináwamlaix, Waiaxum, Alqaníim, and Sisi-le-kaix with several sisters whose names have been forgotten. They thought they were the first to reach this earth but presently, to their sorrow, saw Tíkwaklis, a man who had preceded them, and the women cried bitterly in their mortification. Alqaníim had given Nináwamlaix shamanistic power which he now used as he rubbed his hands over his sisters' faces to carry away their tears.

"Become fog," he said, as he held the palms of his tear-stained hands towards the land of the Ta-qo-ai people.

where they settled. Ajaxmine had given him the ability to kill mammals and birds by merely pointing his power at them, and in this way he obtained food for the whole party. He could also cover his victims with the skin of a peculiar stick bearing enchanters, consisting of green moss. These he arranged around a fire balanced on forces which he could move with his feet, so he ground, the moss became animated and lost its femininity. It was Ajaxmine who had given him these non-human stick-bearers. Kinkonchoix tried to turn mammals into men, but succeeded only with the eyes of the well, whereby these reports appear human even today.

Ajaxmine gave Kinkonchoix the prerogative of carrying out a burial dance, which has been performed in the same manner ever since by the owners of that name. His patrons, for he has four, are the supernatural Carpenters. Kinkonchoix has the further prerogative of wearing, when dancing, a wooden head piece over his forehead representing Qo'ko, perhaps one of the blackbirds. On the night of ceremony, when the musicians are called in, masked figures of the four Carpenters appear, each carrying a conventional specimen of his work. Bows (or end) Hunsrow the masks proper to these beings. Ax'Tikanhoix is, as usual, to wonder and explains the significance of the apparitions.

ORIGIN MYTH OF THE DANCE OF Nanaiqqpam[illegible]

There was once a middle-aged woman who had not been initiated into the ranks of the Ankwiat. She decided that she could gain this distinction only by seeing Ax'Tikanhoix herself, so with this aim in view she set out to search for the supernatural one. First she penetrated to the source of every creek entering South Bentinck Arm; then proceeded up the Nuckatsumay River to its very head, again visiting the head-waters of every affluent, and finally went up the Bella Coola River, as before, exploring each side stream. For a whole year she travelled without seeing anything supernatural.

At the source of the Clearwater she came to a lake on the other side of which she could see a single column of smoke. It ascended without twist, coil, or movement, as if it were solid, so she knew that it must have a supernatural origin. Bravely she skirted the shore, till she saw that the smoke was rising from a house made of evergreen boughs. Stealing nearer, she beheld Ax'Tikanhoix herself within, working with a woman Nanaiqqpam. Ax'Tikanhoix was using rock crystals to strike the woman senseless, and then reviving her; but all the time was causing Nanaiqqpam to sink into the ground. what were his strongest to him. Mythology and origins are so closely connected that a few words on the former must be added here. The principal deity of the Bilqula is Sun, the sun-god (compare very early). The eyes of the sun are his symbols. Which proved to be a valid fashion. In praying the Bilqula look heavenward. I observed the following formulas: 'Above, old-Sun, look on us when we are praying, Sun!' and 'Sun-by, commandment-by, Sun-man-of-us, Sun!' Sun is pre-eminently the ruler of the world, and does not interfere with the actions and thoughts of men. Thus we given by Mamamalq'aq according to the tradition of the Bilqula before the liberation of the sun, and before the world was made as it is nowadays, two deities lived on the earth: Mamamalq'aq, Tsis'tsaqa, Sk'ulqa'qamk, and Ts'ilts'ilk. The sun wished to obtain the sun, but he was unable to liberate it. Then he went to these deities and asked their help. They assented to the sky, and tore the cedars, which up to that time had been expanded between heaven and earth, hiding the heavenly orbs. The sun appeared, but he shone dimly, as though darkened by clouds. The sun assented to heaven through the old cedar to Mamamalq'aq and found there a beautiful green country in which all the birds lived. Mamamalq'aq and his brethren painted them beautifully and sent them down to earth, giving each his song and his wife. The sun was not content with the sun, and wanted to try and find a better one. He flew to the house of a great chief, who kept the sun (no-daughter of, sp-weather-day is dawning). The sun was a small round receptacle closed all around like an egg. The chief guarded it jealously, and kept it concealed from one of the sisters of his house. The sun knew that he could not obtain it by sheer force, and resolved to a ruse. He assumed the shape of the leaf of a spruce tree, and let himself drop into the pool from which the chief's daughter used to take water. The girl drank from the pool, swallowed the leaf, and thus became with child. She gave birth to a boy, who was the sun himself. The old chief loved the boy dearly, and allowed him to play with the sun (sun). This was what he desired. He ran out of the house, broke it, and flew away to the shape of a raven.

After the sun had thus been obtained Mamamalq'aq said: 'Let us make man.' He made the image of a man out of wood, but he was unable to endow it with breath. Mamamalq'aq and Ts'ilts'ilk tried likewise to carve human figures and to give them life, but they failed. Finally, Tsis'tsaqa carved the figure of a man and endowed it with life. He made a man and a woman in each country, and they became the ancestors of all the numerous tribes. Then Mamamalq'aq gave them their arts. He taught them to build canoes, to catch salmon, to build houses. He made rivers everywhere, that man should have water to drink, and that the fish might go up the rivers to be caught by man.

The Bilqula believe that Mamamalq'aq and his brethren still continue to give new ideas to man. They say that any new design of painting or carving, or any other new invention made by a member of their tribe, has been given to him by Mamamalq'aq.

The religious side of the potlatch and of the secret societies has been referred to above.

The soul is believed to dwell in the eye. It is similar in shape to a bird inclosed in an egg. If the shell of the egg breaks and the soul flies away its owner must die. Shamans are able to see and to recover souls.

swing always at his side of all animal beings. While she is making the [illegible], she sings,—

[illegible]

[illegible] swing in the House of Myths is the mother of flowers, called [illegible] (Plate X, Figs. 1 and 2), the daughter of [illegible]. It seems that this bird usually moves "going to the right." This evidently refers to the fact that the bird is believed to move on his path towards the west, his forehead, and consequently during the spring months towards the sky moving towards the right; so that [illegible], moving to the right, moves in the same time the springtime, when the sun is moving up the sky. This is the time when flowers begin to sprout. Every spring [illegible] gives birth to all the plants, in the order in which they begin to appear. It shines to called to fire and by men of women who assist her (Plate X, Figs. 3 and 4).

Every year, at the time of the winter solstice, the deities determine who shall die during the ensuing year. Two beings called [illegible], the [illegible] are placed on the ends of a long plank, which is supported at its centre, and swings like a seesaw. Then all the men and all the animals are called to stand near the ends of the plank. When one of the swinging beings falls down from the plank, the person standing near it will die sooner than the one standing at the opposite end. The deities have a messenger called [illegible] (that means "long ear"), who carries all the news from our earth up to the House of Myths. [illegible] has two children,—the elder, who is called [illegible], that is, "the foolish son of [illegible]" (Plate VII, Fig. 6), and [illegible]. I have not been able to learn any thing in regard to the functions of these two beings.

While [illegible] and [illegible] are principally concerned with the fates of mankind, they do not personally interfere with the doings of men. Their thoughts are carried out by four brothers, who are called collectively [illegible] or [illegible] (Plate VIII, Figs. 1–4). These brothers are [illegible] ("the one who finishes his work by chopping once"), [illegible] ("the one who finishes his work by rubbing once"), [illegible] ("the one who finishes his work by cutting once"), and [illegible]. They have a sister called [illegible]. These four brothers live in an elevated room in the rear of the House of Myths. They are engaged in carving and painting. It is said that they gave man his arts. They taught him to build canoes, to make bows, to build houses, and to carve in wood and to gave. They taught him the methods of hunting, and, according to some, they made the fish. The Bella Coola say, when carving a design, that Mosmosmit'sis gives them the idea which they are working out.

Sisa has a daughter named Sp'ts'ik-ne'is, who invented the art of working cedar-bark. She figures in the ceremonial, in which the invention of the preparation of cedar-bark is represented. The duty has an assistant called Gmaxw'k, who supports the stick over the edge of which she is breaking the bark. When she is breaking bark, she chants, "Kwata ninq'kwas ti Gmaxw'k-ma" ("Bring to me Gmaxw'k"). After he has been given to her, she chants, "Kwata ninq'kwas ta tqmk'ua" ("Bring me the board on which to break the bark"). After receiving this, she demands the cedar-bark brushes, saying, "Kwata mukqmsa'ts a q'a'k-ma." Finally she asks for cedar-bark, saying, "Kwata k'ulk-tkwas-kata a q'a'k-mana." Then she begins to work, singing,—

"[illegible]
[illegible]"

("Behold me, [illegible]
I am the Cedar-bark Breaker at [illegible]")

776

It seems that most of the Bella Coola maintain that the Raven also lives in the House of Myths, but this point of their mythology is somewhat obscure and contradictory. According to the tradition of a number of families, the Raven was one of the beings sent down by Sisa to our world to become the ancestor of men, but at the same time it is told that he invented certain arts. It is stated that he made the first sdmsmsmp (m.th'a'l), which is used in connection with the sdmsm-ceremonial.

It is also said that Mosmosmit'sis attempted to make the whistles for the winter ceremonial, that he was unsuccessful, and that the Raven succeeded in making them; also that the Raven came down to give the world its present shape. He instituted the festivals of the Bella Coola, and then returned to the House of Myths.

Besides all these deities, there are nine brothers and their sister particularly concerned with the observances of the ka'sist ceremonial (Plate IX, Figs. 1-9). The names of the brothers are, Xemsmsmit'sis, Xi'mnsiwa, Omq'omki'lk'a, Q'o'mnsiwa, Aimsli'ts.sis, Ai'omki'lk'a, K'ic'lus, Q'alasi'wa, A'i'mnk'; and of their sister, L'tsmi'qsis.ana. These deities are painted with certain designs. Xemsmsmit'sis and Xi'mnsiwa are painted with the designs of the full moon (the former carries a staff wound with red and white cedar-bark); Omq'omki'lk'a and Q'o'mnsiwa, with the design of the half-moon; Aimsli'ts.sis and Ai'omki'lk'a, with the design representing the stars; K'ic'lus, with the design of the rainbow; Q'alasi'wa, with the de-

[illegible] a [illegible] which is called [illegible] [illegible]. It supports the sky, and prevents the Sun from falling down into the lower world. The trail of the Sun is described as a bridge which was built by Mannamkit'sis. The bridge is to be found on the distance between the winter solstice and the summer solstice. The Sun walks its face turned towards the west. In summer he walks on the right-hand side of the bridge, in winter on the left-hand side of the bridge, which explains the varying heights of the sun in the course of the year. The extreme right and extreme left of the bridge are called Ki'ptsai ("the place where he sits down," that is, the solstices). At each of these points a being is placed who is called Ahkwi'tsaai (Plate X, Fig. 3). It is their duty to see that the Sun does not stay too long at the solstice. If in summer or winter he should be inclined to stay too long or to return too soon, they regulate his course. When the Sun carries too long at the winter solstice, the people say, "Ta-ists pa'sis" ("cold will be dead last this year"). If he leaves it without carrying, they say, "Ak'i'e ists pa'sis" ("soon we shall die cold"). Three guardians named Nagunsp'ensis (Plate X, Fig. 1) accompany the Sun on his course, dancing around him all the time. The hole is called Iwa'ensis ki Mam, t'sis ("the eye of our father"). A [illegible] that appears westward from the Sun is called Aiapsi ki Mam, t'sis ("the painted face of our father"). The Bella Coola believe that when it drops down to our earth, it causes epidemics. During an eclipse the Sun is believed to lose his torch. The eye of the Sun are his cyclashes.

There are twenty-four guardians appointed to take care of the sky. They are called Nesalak'a'a. According to tradition, the sky must be continually fed with firewood. Once upon a time they put too much firewood into the sky and made it burst. All the pieces except one, called S'ax-wait'sam, fell down to our earth. The fragments hit the faces of the twenty-four guardians, and disfigured them. They tried to mend the sky, but did not know how to do it. They went down the river, and came to Mannamkit'sis, whose assistance they asked. Mannamkit'sis gathered up the broken pieces, and glued them together. Up to that time the Sun had said in the east, but now he began to go on his daily course. At that time Mannamkit'sis built the bridge over which the Sun travels every day. He placed a wedge in the opening of the sky, into which the Nesalak'a'a

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

[illegible] of them he gives to the shamans. . . . . A third spirit is the Bear (Dzaúrsenu), which is believed to live in caves and to have the shape of a [illegible]. When a shaman who is inspired by this spirit enters an incantation in a house, singing and dancing, as all the shamans do, whoever approaches the house and hears the song turns back. They believe that whoever passes the house during the incantation will be punished with death by the spirit Bear.[illegible]

I believe this spirit is identical with [illegible], who as noted before, has the second name Dzaúrsenu. According to Jochelson, some shamans are [illegible] by the ghosts. He says that the ghosts are believed to have [illegible] hands and feet like men. I am under the impression, however, that the people [illegible] by them are not shamans, but [illegible] shamans (see Chap. VII).

Another being who [illegible] shamans is described in the following [illegible]:—

Once upon a time there was a man and a woman who had two sons. The three elder sons died. Then the father and mother and the youngest brother were very unhappy, and the old people cried for grief until they died. The young man was now left all alone. He left his village, intending to go away and never to return. He pulled his blanket over his head and walked on. Sometimes he would stop to pray. He lived on the meat of mountain-goats which he shot. He built a small but high up on the mountains, and dried the meat. He was crying and praying all the time. He prayed to the Sun to give him a gift which would remove his happiness. One day early in the morning he recorded the movements. He addressed the rising Sun, saying, "Look at me, how unhappy I am." After he had gone a short distance he came to a swamp. The bed of the swamp was filled with pretty pebbles. There he met a beautiful man, who was no other than the Sun, who had descended from the sky. He had caused the water of the creek that runs through the swamp to disappear. When the young man saw the stranger from a distance, he thought, "He seems to be looking for me." He went nearer; and when they met, the Sun said, "I am the one to whom you are praying all the time, and I come to help you. Now be happy. When you open your mouth and speak to me, I know your thoughts at once. I help those who address themselves to me. Take this." With these words he handed the young man a switch carved in the shape of a man. The Sun was carrying it under his arm, the point of the switch directed downward. "Fold your arms and hold the switch in your chest, and then return to the village. When you approach any one, hide the switch under your arm. You will find a person who wears a mountain-ornament of beautiful green color. Then you must try to hit the ornament with this switch, and throw it to your right side."

[illegible] He collected six, and after a while he collected a new village of a thousand. There he hid the corpse under his arm. When he came back, he saw that the sun was a large green something. He hid it (?) in the corpse, and there it is to the right-hand side. Then the man said, "You have obtained for us your supernatural helper. You cause death by Poison (Dzo 'ulum, 'dead'). Many people have seen you, but nobody has done what you did. If you had not obtained my supernatural, you would have died on seeing me. You shall have the power to heal the sick by the touch of your hands. Whenever a person dies and is put into a box, after the box has been placed in the burial-ground, go there. You will find me sitting on the coffin. If then you touch the something from out of my arm, I shall leave, and the dead will revive. He will drink the box, and will arise."

Then the young man felt very glad. He returned to the village, and by following the instructions of the spirit he resuscitated the dead. He was given many blankets, and the man whom he had resuscitated gave him their daughters in marriage.

[755] [776] Other shamans are initiated by a bird-spirit-man. The same man who gave me the record of his supposed visit to the country of the ghosts (see p. 46) told me that on another time he saw a bird-spirit-man flying in the air outside of his house. He wore a ring of red cedar-bark around his neck. He was turning round all the time. Songs were coming from all parts of his body. Although she did not open her mouth, it sounded as though a great many people were singing. She gave him a song, or, in the narrator's supposed tongue, "she threw a song into his body." At that time he was sick, suffering from a wound in his leg inflicted by an axe. He said four days after receiving the spirit he was able to walk, and since that time she has assisted him in curing diseases.

The s'ôten is another helper of the shaman, and the means of curing disease (see p. 48). It appears that it obtains its supernatural power from the fact that it lives in the water in which the supreme deity washes her face. When a person sees a s'ôten, he should throw sand on it, by which means he will be able to catch it. The skin is so hard that it cannot be pierced with a spear or knife. The person who catches it should not try to cut it with his knife, but should scratch his hand backward, and thus he will find the leaf of a holly, which is the only thing that can cut the skin. He should not touch the s'ôten with his hands, but hold it with hemlock twigs. He should wrap it in white cedar-bark and tie it up in his blanket. If it is not thus tied up, it will disappear. It must not be taken into the house, but should be placed in a small box and hidden under stones, or buried in a hole under the root of a tree. It is a most potent means of curing disease. Sick people will buy small pieces of the s'ôten, for which they pay high prices. The place to throw into water, in which it is kept for four days. Then the water is used for washing the body. If a healthy person uses this water, he will live to an old age. Sick persons chew the white cedar-bark to which it is wrapped up, in order to regain health. They must not swallow the cedar-bark, but only the saliva that gathers in their mouths. A person who has chewed the cedar-bark becomes invulnerable. The eye of the sl'ätsa, is described as about a foot in diameter, and as transparent as rock crystal.

Tsa'lax.'it is the spirit who protects the mountain-goat hunter. He himself is invisible; but great hunters sometimes see his hat, his mountain, or his mountain staff moving about. The following tradition describes some of his characteristics:—

The Raven and the Lynx lived in one house, each occupying one side. Early in the morning the Raven went out to catch salmon with the harpoon. He was very successful, and carried the fish home. Tsa'lax.'it watched the Raven, who, when he arrived at the house, roasted his salmon. The children of the Lynx were sitting near by, and looking at the Raven while he was roasting the fish. They wished to participate in the meal, but he did not give them anything. Then the children were very sad. Now the Lynx made up his mind to make arrows and to go hunting mountain-goat. He went out and cut some wood for his arrows; then he told his wife to make a quiver, which he called Ts'e'lapala. She did so, and wove a quiver of cedar-bark. The Lynx was quite impatient for the sun to rise, so eager was he to start hunting. Early in the morning he arose and ascended the mountain. When he reached the limit of the trees, he sat down on a flat rock and looked for goats. Then he saw the staff of a man who was coming down the mountain. He did not see the person himself. He thought, "Who is that? Who may be hunting here?" The stick approached him; and when it came near, he saw Tsa'lax.'it, who wore a large hat. His hat was named Q'ap'at. (that means a "barren mountain-top"). Tsa'lax.'it reached the Lynx, and sat down opposite him. Neither spoke a word. After a while Tsa'lax.'it arose, took the arrows of the Lynx, and said, "How beautiful these arrows are!" He took up one after another until he had looked at all the four arrows of the Lynx. Then he asked, "Who made these arrows?" The Lynx did not reply. Tsa'lax.'it asked again, "Who made these arrows?" Then Lynx replied, "Tsa'lax.'it made my arrows." Then Tsa'lax.'it was very much pleased, and said, "Is he the one who made your arrows?"—"Certainly," replied Lynx. Then Tsa'lax.'it took his arrows and threw one after another down the mountain, and said to the Lynx, "Now go down the mountain and look at your arrows. If you spoke the truth, every one of them will have killed a large mountain-goat." The Lynx descended the mountain, and saw that every one of his arrows had killed a goat. Then he was glad, because now he had food for his children. He jumped and danced for joy. And Tsa'lax.'a said, "I am Tsa'lax.'a. I am so called because I am the mountain-goat hunter. Now return to your village. From now on, I am your supernatural protector. The next time you go hunting, and you do not find any mountain-goats, sit down and throw your arrows down the mountain. Every one will kill a goat. But do not lose those arrows. If you should lose them, you would never kill another mountain-goat." The mountain-goats were so large, that Lynx took only their fat, which he put into his quiver and climbed down the mountain. He arrived at his house in the afternoon. He left his quiver outside, and the Raven saw him coming in. The Lynx sat down by the side of his wife. He did not say a word. His wife and his children also received him in silence. In the evening, when it was dark, he said to his wife, "Go and fetch my quiver. It is hanging outside on a stick." She went there and tried to lift it, but it was too heavy. She returned to her husband and told him that she was not strong enough to lift it, and asked him to fetch it himself. He said, "It is not heavy." He went out himself and brought it in. He opened it and took out the fat; and he gave some of it to his children, but he did not give any to the Raven's children. Then the Raven was very sad. After a little while, the Raven's children began to cry, because they wanted some of the fat.

Early the next morning the Lynx went to fetch the meat of the mountain-goat. The Raven watched him, and saw where he went. When he saw that the Lynx had killed mountain-goats, he made up his mind to go hunting too. He told his wife to make him a quiver while he went out to cut wood for his arrows. In the evening the quiver and the arrows were done. In the afternoon the Lynx came home, bringing the meat of the mountain-goats. Early the next morning the Raven started, following the tracks of the Lynx. He reached the place where the Lynx had sat down. He sat there, and placed his arrows by his side. He looked around for mountain-goats. After some time he saw a staff moving along in the distance. It approached, and soon he saw a man coming down the mountain. It was Tsa'lax.'a. He reached him, and sat down opposite the Raven. They did not speak a word. After a while Tsa'lax.'a arose, took up the arrows, and said, "Man, your arrows are beautiful. Who made them?" The Raven did not reply. Then Tsa'lax.'a said again, "Tell me who made your arrows." Then the Raven answered, "The name of the man who makes my arrows is Raven." Then Tsa'lax.'a took the arrows, threw them down the mountain, and said to the Raven, "You are bad!" And he turned back, and ascended the mountain. The Raven went down the mountain, trying to find his arrows.

They had let a stone, and their points were broken. He cried there some 537 time, and when it was nearly dark he returned home. Before he reached 776 his house, he cut his own belly and took out some of the fat from his intestines. He cut it in five pieces, and replaced his intestines. He put the fat into his quiver. When he reached his house, he hung the quiver up outside, and entered. He lamented everything the Lynx had done. When it grew dark, he told his wife to fetch his quiver. She brought it, and he told her to open it and to feed his children. She took the fat out, placed it on a stick, and put it near the fire; and as soon as it grew warm, the Raven cried, "This! Don't put it so near the fire. I feel sick when you do so." He jumped up took hold of the fat, and put it back to his belly. The Lynx said, "Formerly I fed your children, but you were the first one to treat me properly. You did not give any food to my children." Then the Lynx took some fat, and flung one piece to each of the Raven's children. He cut some more and gave it to them also. Then the Raven said, "I will give you one of my children, that it may grow up to company with yours."

It is said that the former spirit Tsi'lac'k was killed at one time by an 713 Indian who took his place. This tale is recorded in Chap. IV. It belongs to 776 the tribe of the village Nuxo'q'l. A similar tradition is told of Aiaiu,[1] [570] by which name the Carriers call the Raven, their principal culture hero. Many traditions referring to Aiaiu are common to the Carriers, the Bella Coola, and the Awik'nuxs of Rivers Inlet.

The Bella Coola believe that a being called K'ioxu is the father of all mountaingoats. When a hunter meets him, he thinks he sees a kid. Then 776 he should close his eyes and open them again. If the animal is K'ioxu, it 525 will appear in its real shape as a buck of enormous size. The hunter should then ascend the mountain. If he should descend, he would fall and die.

The thunder-storm is produced by the Thunder-bird, who lives on the 776 mountains, in the company of a number of spirits, who are considered his [521] particular friends. The Thunder-bird himself is represented by a black mask with red nostrils. The nose is strongly curved, the forehead bulges [532] forward, and the chin protrudes almost as far forward as the nose (Plate XI, Fig. 1). His herald is called A'xaxla'xnoom (Plate XI, Fig. 2). His face is painted with orange and blue stripes, and he carries a speaker's staff, which is painted with spirals of the same color. He watches the door of the Thunder-bird's house. In his house live the Rabbit (Plate XI, Fig. 3); the Owl, who is considered the rival of the Thunder-bird (Plate XI, Fig. 4); [575] the Mountain, Lo'qas (Plate XI, Fig. 5); the Raindrop (Plate XI, Fig. 6).

to a guest was regarded as amusing. In recent years, however, 837 some husbands have made a practice of renting their wives to [48] white men. This is not considered creditable, but the Bella [548] Coola do not strongly condemn breaches of the moral code, [183] which are regarded as the affair of the husband alone. There is said to be a Bella Bella custom by which a wife takes as recognized paramour one of the friends of her husband who is thought not only to know of this but to receive the presents which the lover gives his wife. The two continue to be friends and often hunt together; in fact, their mutual interest in the woman is a bond between them. No trace of this practice [171] could be found in Bella Coola.

POLYGAMY

It has thus far been assumed that the Bella Coola are 595 monogamous, an assumption correct only since the period of 556 white dominance. Previous to that time it was quite common [177] for wealthy men to have three, four, or more wives. Pathu, the important chief so often mentioned, had nine, ten, or eleven, the exact number is not known. A man wishing to take a second wife could do so in the manner already described, although the period of engagement was usually much shorter, and working for his parents-in-law was not expected. The reason for this was obvious to the Bella Coola. None but a chief of importance could afford more than a single wife, and such an one could not be expected to demean himself by working for anyone else. Besides, parents were glad to have their daughters married to a great chief, so willingly omitted the customary period of servitude. Few attained the distinction of having several wives. As far as could be learnt, [162] the number of the sexes seems always to have been about equal, in itself a check to polygyny in a community where practically every adult had a wife. A number of males were always slain in war, and it is to be assumed that polygyny was made possible only through the surplus of women thus caused. The great majority of men had a single wife, some chiefs had

although her refusal would be most unusual on account of his [567]
prestige. There were no professional prostitutes; a man [548] usually gave a small present to a girl from whom he had received favours, and she was expected to give him a little, dainty basket filled with undyed cedar-bark to use as a sponge. Such relations appear always to have been of common occurrence. Today, as formerly, a man's morality is considered to 836
be his own affair; laxity may lower his prestige, but no law is 522
broken, and his neighbours laugh and chaff him about it. In fact, sexual matters are discussed with the greatest freedom, and a person who has been caught is mocked mercilessly. When visiting a foreign tribe, a man sometimes lives with a [648]
woman and, on parting, composes and sings a song describing her charms. One man did this after living with a Kitlope woman, and on his return to Bella Coola found that some of his fellows had learnt it in some unexplained manner; they used to sing it to him, much to their amusement, in part to his own, and somewhat to the annoyance of his wife. This perhaps illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola to an infraction of morality—where no marriage rite has been broken; it is amusing rather than disgusting. There 836 are no times when the moral code ceases to function. At pot-
latches, and also at kusiut dances, there appears always to [834] have been a certain amount of laxity, although this was strictly prohibited within the house where the ceremony was taking place. Such behaviour is due to the excitement and stimulus of a large gathering, not to anything connected with the rites themselves.

Perverted sexual desires, like other matters connected with 834
the relations of the sexes, are regarded as concerning the individual alone. Sodomy appears to be unknown. Intercourse 836
by pre-adolescents is held to be disgusting, but carries with it
no social ostracism. Incestuous union, however, is mildly anti- 835 social; it exposes the offender to secret contempt, but does not interfere with his attainment of whatever position his wealth 556 rate most of them, are carefully used in accordance with the 776* functions of this supreme deity. As a Bella Coola has many [551] names, corresponding to his membership in various societies, his professional prerogatives, his ancestral myths, and mere nicknames, so has Ālquntām, who is a superman, many names, according to his special functions. It would be unthinkable [782] for a Bella Coola to pray to Ālquntām, yet it is common for him to pray to Mīnakais or Tātā, other names for the same being. The multiplicity of functions and designations approaches the point of obscuring the unity of Ālquntām, which in fact, some Bella Coola even deny. They state that Sinxālotla, Mīnakais, Smaialotla, and Nuxekmālsaix are one, but that Ālquntām, Snuxlkāls, and Nonodjonostem are three distinct supernatural beings. This seeming confusion presents [424] no difficulties to the Indian, since each family has its own [184] myths in which such facts are recorded. He believes these, [771] without questioning those of his neighbour, and it is even possible for an individual to believe two contradictory statements, if he happens to become the owner of two contradictory myths. Evidence collected in the field does not make clear whether the beliefs of the Bella Coola illustrate an incomplete transformation of a single deity into a number of minor ones, or whether they represent the almost complete fusion of a number of beings into one. Following the practice of the great majority of the Bella Coola, the supreme deity will be referred to as Ālquntām.

The most obvious attribute of Ālquntām is connected with 776*
the sun. He can enter it and use it as if it were his canoe. In 821 form he resembles a man, and when he takes charge of the sun it appears as if the latter were a large, self-propelling, radiant boat with windows through which he looks forth. It is said that long ago he allowed mink to take charge of the sun, but the malicious animal ran it so close to earth that the intense heat killed almost all living creatures. When Ālquntām enters [825] the sun he wears a cloak, on the lining of which are salmon; reversing this causes the rivers on earth to teem with salmon.

773 hanging a number of bird and animal cloaks, representing ravens, eagles, whales, grizzly bears, black bears, and a few others. Alqwntām asked each individual which of these cloaks he preferred to wear. One selected a raven, another an eagle, and so on. Each donned his choice from the wall and immediately became the bird or animal chosen. Alqwntām gave each man or woman one or more names, and some food in compressed form; then sent him down in avian or mammal form. Even the animals could travel through the air like birds, and each landed on the peak of a mountain in the Bella Coola country, took off his cloak, and reassumed human form. The discarded coverings floated back up to Nuxmāt·a. A few individuals, instead of coming to earth in animal form, swarmed down posts which stretched between the worlds.

177 773 This myth is fervently believed by the Bella Coola. Even Christian Indians, though they readily admit the biblical creation as applied to the white race, remain convinced of the manner in which their own ancestors came into being. At the present time, though most ancient beliefs are rapidly passing away, few, if any, Bella Coola doubt this account of the creation of their forefathers. Their conviction rests not only on the religious aspect of their life, but on the sociological. A man's [551] [424] most treasured possessions are the name brought down from above by his ancestor in the beginning of time, the knowledge of the form taken by that ancestor, and information about the place where he landed. A collection of myths of this kind is given in vol. I, chap. VI. Lacking knowledge of his first ancestor's form, a Bella Coola has slight chance of becoming a [622] [554] [567] chief; such lore is the birthright of every descendant of one of these first people, and those without it are almost certain to be the offspring of slaves. The social aspects of creation myths will be described later; at this point a broad outline must suffice. Nuxmāt·a, "The House of Myths," is the place in which these myths were made, and are now stored, two reasons for its importance in the eyes of the Bella Coola.

[775] Nuxmāt·a is not only connected with the history of an india friend. Raven determined to supply this want for the benefit of the Kimsquit people. Accordingly he used a natural stone depression near the village as his chamber-pot, and the liquid reflected faces clearly. Ever since, any liquid, even rain-water, placed in that depression acts as a reflector. The place is called Ăwilxsaix, "Where People Go," and it has been used as a mirror by the Kimsquit people and their guests for many generations. In this way, the renown of Raven spread to foreigners visiting Kimsquit. Another survival of this construction is the name Nuxqălăt-a, "Chamber-Pot," commonly applied as a nickname to the small daughters of Kimsquit chiefs. 773 778 823 [551]

One of Raven's inventions was the making of nettle-fibre olachen nets, an art which he taught spiders as well as men. In the beginning of time, Raven told two men to make a net according to a pattern which he showed them, and gave them some fibre. It was not sufficient, and when the workers asked for more, Raven told them to draw it from their own intestines. This they did, and ever since spiders have had the same ability. Another story describes how Raven saw an olachen net being made in one of the distant villages which he visited during his travels, learnt the details of its manufacture, and taught the Bella Coola on his return home. 773 [227] [825]

Many of Raven's exploits are well known, although not embodied in elaborate myths. For example, it is believed that in the beginning of time the ocean was to the east of Bella Coola and the land to the west. Drownings were frequent, so Raven altered the relative positions of land and sea. Most ocean dwellers followed the sea to its new home, but a number of mussels remained near their human friends. They are still to be found in the upper valley of Bella Coola River. These shell-fish, which are probably freshwater mussels, are said to be identical with those of the ocean, and are called by the same name. This is always mentioned as proof of the former presence of salt water in the upper Bella Coola valley. The occurrence of the shell-fish may be the origin of this theory. It might also be mentioned that the Bella Coola believe that a few years 773 823 [825]

778 Shamans achieve much of their success through their ability 777 to put their wash-basins, both tangible (I, p. 560) and imma-
823 terial, in tune with Ałquntăm's in the land above. One method 756 of treating a patient is by washing, with the idea that the water [755] and vessel used have potency through association with those in the upper world. It is believed that in the distant past, shamans were even able to carry their patients to the land above and wash them in Ałquntăm's own basin. Such feats [551] are perpetuated in certain shamans' names, such as Ałpälxe-lselsix.

778 It may be said in conclusion that although the Bella Coola 777 have indefinite ideas concerning the exact form and functions of this last element, there is a firm belief that an individual's fortune in life depends upon the activity of spirit, tally post, and wash-basin. With regard to supernatural elements as a whole, it is clear that in spite of somewhat conflicting beliefs concerning the precise functions of each, they play an important part in the life of every Bella Coola.

Means of Propitiation

782 Some of the methods employed by the Bella Coola to gain the favour of the supernatural have already been mentioned, but the subject is sufficiently important to warrant a separate section. In view of the omnipresence of supernatural beings and powers, and their influence on the lives of mortals, it is not surprising that the propitiation of them is a vital factor in human life. The chief means are prayer, sacrifice, and the observance of ceremonial chastity.

Prayer

[796] Prayers are regularly addressed to Ałquntăm who, in this connection, is known as Mănakaix or Tätä, both meaning, "Father." A wise man or woman desiring success in hunting, in love affairs, in the acquisition of wealth, or in any activity whatsoever, is accustomed to ask Mănakaix to grant his desire. No ritual is required. The petitioner merely seeks a lonely

This endogamic principle will be described in greater detail in vol. I, chap. VII, but mention of it here has been necessary to explain the composition of the ancestral family. 582 [614]

In recent years there has been a tendency for some men to marry foreign women in order that they, or their children, might obtain new prerogatives. Thus a trend towards exogamy has arisen from the same reason which is supposed to have caused endogamy. The offspring of such marriages cannot enjoy the feeling of strength and comfort that comes from the membership of both parents in the same ancestral family, but some individuals have felt that this was offset by the gain of highly desirable foreign prerogatives. It is said that this practice was initiated by a certain Potles, father of a man about sixty years old in 1923. White influence probably had nothing to do with this radical innovation, although its wide adoption has been made more easy by the establishment of peaceful conditions on the coast. [554] [177]

Strong as is the belief in a common ancestry, it is unlikely that this would have sufficed to hold together the members of the ancestral family, without some definite prerogatives. These are of two kinds: names and land. 614 554

NAMES

The fundamental principle governing Bella Coola nomenclature is that each name must have originated in connection with some event of comparative importance. It is unthinkable to apply a casual designation to a child. At a person's death his name, or names, may be transmitted to a relative, and it is proper that the owner of a name should know when, by whom, and for what reason, it was first created. Tradition affirms that, before coming to this earth, the first people were all given designations by Ālquntām; these have been carefully handed down and are still in use. One name cannot be given to two individuals; instances occur of two people having the same one, but in such cases they have different origins. One person may have several names of different kinds, each carrying 551 [768] [553] [773] [428]

551 with it some definite prerogative of a dance or other function, 428 but all are transmissible, and at the owner's death these may fall to different relatives. A name may pass from man to woman, or vice versa, in some cases with a minor alteration. [756] The only non-inheritable appellations are those obtained by shamans as a result of their supernatural experiences.

551 Not only did each group of first settlers bring with them a 773 number of designations from above, but they also created a number on this earth and bestowed them on their children, 553 and on the children of their sisters or brothers, in whom they felt an almost parental interest. To mark the dignity of the names, all present at the ceremony of bestowal received gifts from the creator of the name, the person who called them together for the rite. The importance of the individual depended largely upon the value of the goods distributed with respect to his name, a concept which will be elaborated in the following chapter. The descendants of these first people likewise created new designations and established their dignity by distributing presents, a practice which still continues. It follows that any complete origin myth should include a large number of names, those brought down from the land above[1] and also those created by the powerful first people on this earth itself.[2] Both types of cognomen will be referred to henceforth as "ancestral names," no distinction being made between those actually brought from above and those made on earth. This is in accordance with Bella Coola usage.

553 Soon after the birth of a child his father, uncle, or other near relative,[3] either on the paternal or maternal side, calls the members of the village together to bestow a name on the infant. The one selected must be embodied in the origin myth of one or other of the parents, and must be one not then in use by any other member of the ancestral family. A relative may give the

553 an origin myth of names originally brought into the ancestral
178 family by a woman from abroad. Unless intercourse and 773 friendly relations were maintained by "return marriages," in a few generations no tradition would be remembered to account for the name, and this, if used at all, would be interwoven into the well-known ancestral myth. Hence a myth is not static with regard to the names embodied in it. These change from generation to generation; it is probable that elements of the story itself suffer like additions and alterations, even though the people do not consider this to be the case.

611 The Bella Coola regard the ancestral family as a social unit,
614 not only in terms of the present, but as stretching back to the first settlement of the earth. Viewed from this angle, it is in fact, though not admitted to be so by the Bella Coola, a unilateral grouping with patrilineal descent, which may, in both the most recent and most ancient generations, be marked by matrilineal descent instead. A man frequently uses prerogatives obtained through his mother, her mother, or even her mother's mother, but it is tacitly assumed that for many previous generations such rights passed in the patrilineal line. Sometimes this succession extended back to the beginning of time; in other cases, prerogatives were transmitted matrilineally for a considerable period after the settlement of the earth, before gradually becoming patrilineal.

614 It has been thus far assumed that the only prerogative
424 wrapped up in an ancestral name is a knowledge of the myth in which it is embodied. But there are others. For example, 551 several of the first inhabitants of the world are said to have erected totem-poles, each of which was displayed by its owner at the gathering when he took for himself a name. Thenceforth, the only person entitled to use that particular totem-
[532] pole design was the person with the legal right to the name in [535] question. The same principle governs all dance names; each entitles its owner to perform a certain ceremonial. Thus it is possible to enlarge the previous definition by saying that:

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The ancestral family consists of those whose ancestral names, embodying definite prerogatives, are embodied in a single origin myth. 614 424 551

A stranger finds it easier to understand why names are so carefully maintained within the ancestral family by thinking of them as symbols of prerogatives, but it must be emphasized that the Bella Coola preserve with equal jealousy those designations of which the only prerogative is the marking of this actual membership. [554]

If, then, the ancestral family be regarded as a group possessing a large number of name-prerogatives, it may well be asked how these are distributed among the members. The first point to be emphasized is that the ancestral family is a unit held together without definite social mechanism. There is no accepted "head" of the family, nor are there any clearly formulated laws governing the transmission of the name-prerogatives. Before death a man usually calls together his relatives and bequeaths,[8] according to his desire, his personal property in slaves and canoes, and his intangible property in names. Such a designation does not become the property of the new owner unless he is able to validate his ownership by a distribution of presents; meanwhile the name is "dead." If, during this period, some other member of the ancestral family should desire it for a child, or for himself, he can take possession of it by the customary distribution of presents. In doing so he would anger the legatee, but the latter cannot himself use the appellation since it is already in use. Even at the present time there are bitter quarrels over the assumption of names, and such have certainly occurred for many generations. If a man can validate fairly promptly a name willed to him, it is most unusual for anyone else to try to forestall him. 614 553 428 553 431 [578]

If a man dies intestate, his sons consider themselves his normal heirs, and the most respected of them validates for himself as many names as he desires or is able to assume. Disputes are not as common as might be expected since the 428 553 [578]

[8] In case of sudden death or failure to make a will confusion sometimes occurs.

554 or sat in two rows, facing one another, on opposite sides of the
* 556 central fire, parallel to the side walls of the house. When these [773] first ancestors died, the name of each was passed on to some descendant. The Bella Coola feel that he who bears the name [551] of the first settler in a village should have his ancestor's seat.
[171] Comparison with the practices of other coastal tribes suggests that formerly the Bella Coola must have had a definite series of seats in their houses, either according to the rank of the occupant, or according to the rank of the ancestor whose name he bore. The most careful investigation, however, failed to show such a system of ranked seating. The only indications that such may once have been customary, are found in the feeling today that the bearer of the first chief's name ought to occupy the central seat behind the fire, and in the expression, "He seats himself where his ancestor sat," when a youth is given his place in the house.

[551] A seat can be claimed and an ancestral name assumed at any age. Goods must be given away which are said to be "covering" for the young man, to have "flowed away," or to have "become nothing" for the name. These validate the official assumption of the designation. With it is given a place in the house. A seat is chosen at the side of the fire, and the goods mark that spot as his in conjunction with the name.
[424] The seat itself is not material, though the general location on which a person shall sit is indicated. His "seat" is the goods that have been expended. Several men may have positions at practically the same spot, but when all are seated they merely move slightly so that all have room. There is no thought of one person infringing on the location of another. A parent who gives ample wealth at successive potlatches may seek for his son a seat behind the fire. Such is entirely his own affair and if sufficient goods are distributed the son may seat himself in that place, but if the gifts are of little value the occupant is secretly held in derision, as having a seat that is unsound, or unfirm. In later years the man may expend large sums in strengthening his seat; by so doing he wins recognition from the food and goods distributed, since it was winter and the 553 people were in dire straits on account of the destruction of all 556 * their stores. In consequence, the uncle decided to make a new name for his nephew, Skāml, "Charred Wood." By virtue of the goods expended this name became an honourable title, and was maintained by lavish presents. Any similar incident connected with a potlatch can be made the origin of a designation. Another example of a manufactured name is one derived from a peculiarity of the man giving the potlatch. A number of years ago a chief was jeered at by his associates on account of the frequency with which he had to visit the toilet. When next he gave a potlatch he created the name Āpstel·a, "The Toilet One," and gave great dignity to the designation by presents.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Since a seat is valuable only on account of the goods ex- 554 pended in obtaining it with respect to a certain name, it is 556 * obvious that names and seats are closely associated. A man who wishes his son to succeed to his own location in the house seats the youth, as has been described, at his feet. It may be a matter of years before he actually takes his father's position, but during that time he is treated with respect; he is still a commoner, but it is recognized that his parent considers him likely to "make good" and become a true chief by ability to give presents. Should he fail to do so, inexorably his influence wanes, in spite of his name and duly validated seat. He keeps the latter, but it is no longer considered one of importance. Thus, too, the course of names from generation to generation [551] ● is a series of curves; sometimes one is on a pinnacle of glory when "made strong" by a powerful chief, but in the next generation it may fall to the dust through ownership by a [195] weakling. As the Bella Coola express it: It has become hermaphroditized.

A woman is rarely established in a seat, and usually only when a chief has no sons or other near male descendants. In [562] such a case she receives an ancestral name and has the same status as a male chief. At the present time one important

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as ones
* 556 for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the 562 ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to [553] assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for her (see I, p. 410). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women and, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their owners. Most names given to children, though embodied in [551] origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into ill-repute through failure to give potlatches.

554 With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn be-
* 556 tween chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a 622 man's influence in the community has become so great that he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for [352] him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown [626] to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

[532] On the material seat are carved the man's ancestral crests, [352] in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and in these, likewise, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of mental superiority, as if strength-

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

as a man by the duly validated ownership of a chief's name in her own right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs seat themselves according to their proper positions and are first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The cuts run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[3]

Wealthy chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary meals even when no seal or deer has been killed. On these occasions, as at seal feasts, the guests are designated by their ancestral names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occasions their number may be augmented by men of influence in the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the kallat society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a numitl chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but

[3] Every effort was made to ensure the accuracy of this account, but errors may have crept in on account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremony was carried out in full detail.

184 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there
476 was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity
* 556 of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Sisaak Society

551 The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position
* 556 of eminence are usually embodied in myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been 575 stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions
614 record other designations as well, each of which carries with it [535] the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as sisaak. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as sisaak names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men
* 556 and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way 575 a number of times, acquiring a new sisaak name on each occa-
[562] sion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a sisaak name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

present, and the fame of the initiate is thereby carried farther afield than would be possible if only Bella Coola were in attendance. Every individual duly secluded and given a susook name feels himself ceremonially allied to others who have had a similar experience, and they form a grouping which may be termed the susook secret society. 553 556* 575

The close connection between this society and chiefs is obvious from the presence of names of each type in the same ancestral myths. None the less, every chief, that is a person with duly validated ancestral name and seat, is not a susook, unless he has validated a susook name for himself and undergone the period of seclusion. Conversely, a man may be a duly authorized member of the susook although lacking a seat and the other marks of chieftainship. The relationship is, however, so close that the Bella Coola think of the susook society as a society of chiefs. Susook dances take place at potlatches and funerals, and occasionally at gatherings of less importance. Difficulties arise at the death of a chief who has failed to use some of his goods for the acquisition of a susook name. Such a case took place at the death of an important Bella Coola in the summer of 1923. Theoretically, he was ignorant of susook rites, but after much discussion these were used on account of his importance as a numitl chief, an instance of the manner in which a man's personal importance over-rules ceremonial dictates. 575 622 [553] [535] [766] [183]

The Bella Coola believe that only some of their susook name-prerogatives came to this earth at the beginning of time with their first ancestors, and that many more have been acquired later by supernatural experiences. These were especially common among their forbears as they ranged over this earth seeking places to settle in the beginning of time. No susook name can be assumed casually; each must have had a specific origin. There are few susook origin myths, though theoretically there should be one to account for every name. The explanation appears to lie in the undoubted fact that many susook prerogatives have been acquired comparatively recently 424 551 575 773 [177]

McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

177 from the Bella Bella, a fact emphasized by all. It is not diffi-424 cult to understand, therefore, why elaborate myths are lacking, even if such were possessed by the Bella Bella. The Bella 551 Coola possessed certain similar rites to which the Bella Bella
575 prerogatives were in the process of being grafted at the time [773] of the coming of the white man. There has since been general decay of ceremonial life, with the result that the whole situation is in a state of flux presenting great difficulties to the investigator.

428 Sisaok names are willed and inherited in the manner already described for other prerogatives. The type of dance, and the 551 time of use, will be described in the following section of this 575 chapter.

The Potlatch

* 556 It is unfortunate that an adequate treatment of Rank 128 among the Bella Coola requires a description of the potlatch since this ceremony, or rather group of ceremonies, includes a number of features which, logically, should have been postponed until a later stage of this monograph. An effort has been made to lessen references to non-ritualistic features by the description, just given, of the basic concepts of chieftainship and the sisaok society. Other ideas will require rather lengthy digressions, a method of presentation which seems preferable to the use of many foot-notes, its only alternative.

General Observations

104 In scientific and popular writings alike, the term "pot-
* 556 latch" has been applied both to the public giving of presents, [431] and to the rites at which this occurs. But among the Bella Coola, such distribution of gifts is necessary at every ceremonial; accordingly, each is essentially a potlatch. There is one, however, which the inhabitants regard as the most important of all, the goal which every ambitious man aims to reach, the rite in which his ancestral myth can be displayed. In this

1:16:Hwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name. The speaker always recounts the whole myth before announcing which portion of it is transmitted to X as a prerogative. It is understood that this transference will be duly validated by presents to X when he gives his potlatch. Such are termed dsämänumtnum and signify the repurchase of a wife from her husband. Though this is known to be a fiction it has extreme social importance. Unless dsämänumtnum is paid there is an ineradicable blot upon the children; in fact, it is one of the essentials of a legal marriage. All prerogatives thus transferred on xläxtnum become the property of X and will in time pass to his children, unless recalled to the wife's family by further repurchase (dsämänumtnum) money or goods. In this fashion elements of family myths become scattered, and one of the considerations in choosing a wife is to select a woman able to bring back some missing part of the husband's myth. 556* 425 583 [581]

The usual present is an ancestral name, which X henceforth uses as potlatches as his most distinguished title, though the myth in which it is incorporated does not belong to him. As long as the name remains in X's family those who originally owned it are unable to make use of it. Such a name is said to be "dragged across" by the wife to her husband, the immense weight or importance of the designation being compared with the dragging of a heavy log. Occasionally, the father of a married woman, animated by the kindliest feelings towards his son-in-law, may give him outright a myth with all the names embodied therein. This can happen only where there are no other survivors of the family. In such a case when the myth is recounted it must always be mentioned how it has been obtained. The number and type of the prerogatives transferred depend upon the sentiments with which his wife's family regard X. If, in addition to being a worthy man, he is member of their ancestral family, or of one with which his wife's has frequently intermarried, so that in course of generations prerogatives have intermingled, there is less objection to giving him such rights than if he were an unrelated individual. first established on his seat, he must reward the heralds lavishly for their remarks. 203 556*

As with so many elements of culture, the Bella Coola ascribe the origin of heralds to the wish of Ālquntām as expressed to the first people in the beginning of time. Some groups of these early settlers brought with them heralds whose games had been created by the supreme deity himself in his house in the land above. Such a one was Q̄āqāt'li who was a member of Xemcua's (I, p. 326) party at Kimsquit, another was Olḳdimut who came with ɩyuyuyut (I, p. 329). These heralds functioned in the manner of their descendants of today; others of the first chiefs appointed certain of their relatives to perform this service, and by means of the power with which they were endowed, created names with respect to their functions. Besides his ordinary name every herald must have an ancestral appellation of some kind, as well as the probability of possessing kusiut ones in addition to those of a professional nature. Either by bringing with them from above, or by creation on this earth, each group of first settlers became provided with a herald, whose name is embodied in the ancestral myth describing their experiences. As each of the first heralds died, his name was passed to a successor, and this practice has been carried out from generation to generation until the present. The Bella Coola state that no new names for heralds have been created since the time of the first people, and it is certain that none has been made for many years. Consequently, the number of heralds is strictly limited in accordance with mythological beliefs, and every man who owns one of the ancient designations embodied in an origin myth knows the name of the herald associated with his first namesake. 203 773 551 [428]

At the death of a herald his name becomes dormant. Since heralds function at all ceremonies, whether or not the donor belongs to the same ancestral family as themselves, the members of the group sustaining the loss are not deprived of their 203 553 556* 614 424

*556 773 flesh cut from the body is fastened to the point of the spear, making it so potent that when next the chief lunges at a salmon he transfixes it and brings it ashore. He warms the fish at a fire and then pounds it on a stone until it becomes a copper.

No Bella Coola has visited this distant river for many generations and the belief concerning the manufacture of taitaimx appears to have been handed down from dim antiquity. Coppers of this kind are said to have been considered much more valuable than the usual łālia, but were always uncommon. In addition to their ordinary uses, they had a certain curative value. If the owner of one was ill, he used to clean it [755] with a rough stone and water; then he would drink four cupfuls of the liquid which contained minute fragments of metal. In almost every case a speedy recovery followed. In all other respects łālia or taitaimx could be used indiscriminately.

Łālia are likewise said to have a supernatural origin. When found in the forest, they are due to the supernatural salmon- [776] like being, sisiutl, having changed itself into one. None has been found in recent years because the sisiutl have moved away owing to their dislike of the smell of human footsteps and the taint of smoke.

These stories serve to emphasize the complete ignorance of [325] the Bella Coola concerning the methods of manufacturing coppers. It is possible that long ago they were able to make their own by pounding the native metal, but if so it is surprising that some traditions to this effect were not preserved. On the other hand, there is little reason to doubt their use of [177] coppers, obtained from the northern tribes, antedating the coming of the whites. All informants agreed on this point, and the frequent references to coppers in mythology likewise point to considerable age. In many of the ancestral myths there are accounts of the obtaining of coppers by some of the [551] first people, and many ancestral names, both of men and women, are derived from them.

[237] The Bella Coola attribute the value of coppers to the fact

424 as possible, a potlatch is the most suitable occasion. Goods 463 distributed for this purpose are not returnable; they have
"become nothing" in the acquisition. The value of presents so
* 556 bestowed differs enormously; a man who is proud of his prerogative validates it lavishly until he is strong in his vocation, whereas another establishes himself on a lesser scale. The origin
[773] of professional rights, like so many of other kinds, is lost in antiquity and ascribed to the wishes of Ăłquntăm as expressed to the first people. Some of the early settlers came to earth
[551] with definite duties and vocations, each indicated by a special name; others, lacking these, created them through their own enormous power. At the death of one of these incumbents,
424 his name passed to one of his relatives who acted in the same
463 manner as his predecessor after duly validating the name in 553 question. Ever since that time, the owner of a confirmed professional name has been able to perform the functions of the
* 556 prerogative. This is never a man's sole designation, but merely [551] an addition to those of ancestral, kusiut, ssaok, and other types. Like them, professional names are usually willed by their owners, though if this is neglected, one can be revived by any member of the deceased's ancestral family. In such a case, the older people usually decide on a suitable incumbent and suggest the matter to him; if he does not accept, the opportunity is given to another. If a member of the group is eager to validate the name, it is unlikely that anyone would try to a man, ux·winaisa, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this function. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the validation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name ux·winaisa has always been able to perform his duties.
[789] forestall him. Ability in certain respects can also be obtained by magical means (I, p. 701), and a member of the ancestral family so endowed is the natural choice for the prerogative in question.

Prerogatives of this kind can be grouped according to the types of vocation included.

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been enforced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them from seeing the route. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive stakes for olachen nets.

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can be set afloat, and even a canoe which has just been completed must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences.

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the salmon and it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river. The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by 688 his relatives. This punishment is customary in cases of the 693 upsetting of a canoe. Death is the penalty for throwing refuse into the river, particularly during the summer, and until the [177] coming of the white man the River Guardian exacted it without hesitation.

THE PROFESSION OF UTTERING A DRONING CRY

424 At the appearance of masked figures representing super-551 natural beings, whether in sisaok or kusiut dances, many of the women repeatedly utter a peculiar, high-pitched, droning cry [575] which adds considerably to the weirdness and impressiveness [463] of the occasion. Ability to do this depends on an ancestral prerogative duly confirmed by the distribution of presents.
[431] Many ancestral myths describe how some of the first women [773] were given by Ałquntäm, or acquired in other ways, the right to drone, and mention is made of the name used by each with respect to this prerogative. Unlike the one previously described, many of the first women possessed this privilege, which is accordingly common at the present time. A name [553] of this type is usually confirmed in girlhood, sometimes even in infancy, and being of relatively slight importance may be validated at a ceremony of less dignity than a potlatch. One of these names is Nunuqwełełslaixen·a, which has reference to [773] the blue-green sheen of some abalone-shell brought from the east by Raven in the beginning of time, as described in the ancestral myth in which this name is included. For many [178] years there has been considerable laxity with regard to this prerogative, and women lacking it have even been urged to drone in order to add to the solemnity of the occasion and to increase the wonder of the uninitiated.

424 There is another similar prerogative, enabling the incum-767 bent to drone at mourning ceremonies. In the beginning of 463 time, Smaoan of Kimsquit married Tłäkwaitł, the daughter of 773 a Bella Bella chief, who had this right. It has since been transmitted from one of her descendants to another at Kimsquit.

quit. Details of this prerogative were not obtainable, but it seems to follow the general type. 424 767 463

THE PROFESSION OF FIRST BERRY PICKER

All women can pick berries, but in every village there is at least one who has the prerogative of picking the first of every kind. The origin of this right is lost in dim antiquity, but, like all others, each first berry picker has a special professional name embodied in her ancestral myth which must be duly validated before she can function. One of these is Stłxwaxwak-nimän·a, another is Łoʼyɔ. Though normally reserved for women, one of these names is occasionally given to a male child, in which case it is said to have been hermaphroditized. No one would dare to pick berries until the legal picker has paraded up and down the sidewalk carrying on her back her picking basket decorated with a representation of the sun, an act which is believed to ripen the berries. 222 424 463 551 562 532 789

"Get ready to pick red elderberries [or whatever species is ripe] tomorrow," she keeps calling out.

The berries may then be picked by anyone. This is repeated for every variety. As far as could be learnt, there was no social mechanism to punish a woman who picked berries before the announcement of the official picker; obedience seems to have been so universal that infractions are said to have been unknown though formerly there may have been some penalty of which even the memory has disappeared. 688 183

THE PROFESSION OF WARRIOR

The profession of warrior is another prerogative handed down from the distant past and requiring validation before it can be used. As with other rights of this type, magical means are in many cases employed to make any young man brave and successful, but there are a number of warriors confirmed as such by the distribution of presents at the time of bestowal on them of professional names. At the present time, it is 701 424 463 431 551

THE PROFESSION OF HUNTER

224 424 Another profession which is entered by means of an ancestral prerogative is that of hunting. Many Bella Coola have [463] validated their right to this vocation, some by confirming names created by their early ancestors, others by legalizing those brought down from above in the beginning of time. [551] One of the latter is Lelaimkila, "The Brusher Off," so-called because the owner is such a successful hunter that he can sweep mountain goats from the mountains as easily as an ordinary person can brush insects from a wall. Unlike the professions of carpenter and singer, it is believed that legalization of a hunter's name always brings success to the holder; perhaps because everyone is more or less successful, it follows [555] that whatever good fortune is achieved by a professional hunter can be attributed to the validation of his prerogative. Others, [556] lacking this assistance, may be proficient, but their success never carries with it the social prestige gained by a man who has distributed goods to substantiate the prerogative.

224 424 184 There is a difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as to whether or not certain hunting methods are inheritable prerogatives. [177] With the introduction of rifles, these have long been discontinued, and no definite information was obtained regarding the social position of their users. Several of the older men believed that the contrivances depended upon ancestral prerogatives, whereas others stated that they were merely individual discoveries which could have been, and in many cases were, imitated by anyone. It seems probable that most of the following practices are prerogatives, although it may be that they are no more than special hunting devices suitable only in certain areas and, therefore, limited to the members of the ancestral family owning that particular locality.

223 424 The method about which the most definite information was obtained, was one formerly employed by a certain Nusxalxiq to catch geese at Tāl·io. According to one elderly Bella Coola, presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the sisaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqwal for his name Sinxälotła which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Łłaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuxetł (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Łłaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[9] long, long ago, Äłqunłäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sinxen·a, and a mortal; so he

539 to climb up to visit his grandfather. Bo'ostom did not discourage him, so his son began the ascent and soon disappeared from sight. In course of time he reached the land above and made his way to his grandfather, Ăłquntăm, who was delighted to see him. He told his visitor that he was weary of constantly carrying the sun's light, and asked him to relieve [821] him of the duty for a time. He mentioned that on previous occasions when his wife had acted as his substitute, she, being a woman, had been shy and had hidden herself behind clouds. The boy was willing to undertake the task and listened to his grandfather's instructions; in the morning he was to use only one fire stick, a little later, two, then three, and, finally, four at midday. In the afternoon he was to decrease the number in a manner corresponding to the morning's increase.[10]

Next day Ăłquntăm went away for a holiday after entrusting his grandson with the precious fire sticks. As soon as he was alone, the malicious youth began to pile one after another on the fire, until people in the world far below were wakened at dawn by the suffocating warmth. Bo'ostom's son threw on log after log, each increasing the heat below. The earth began to sizzle, and finally burst into flames, and the water boiled in the rivers and ocean. Sıxan·a had realized what must be the matter as soon as she felt the great heat, so she went outside and rubbed her hand over the planks on her house. Thus protected, those within survived, although all other human beings perished. Most of the animals [825] escaped by hiding, though the weasel failed to conceal the tip of its tail which was burnt black, a characteristic inherited by all weasels ever since. Ăłquntăm felt the heat and hurried home.

"You have done great harm to mortals," he burst out angrily. "Hence- [825] forth you shall live on earth as a mink."

Ăłquntăm seized his grandson and cast him to earth in this guise.

539 The survivors of the catastrophe multiplied until the whole world was repopulated from the single household. Each of them took an a'alk 551 name from the burning, and these have been transmitted from one to 575 another of the descendants of each until this day. One of these, a nusqwal name, is Stalḑalosam, "The Increase of the Sun's Heat through the Addition of Fire Sticks"; another, a Haiyăkam, ıxnukwnelsaix, "The Track of the Sun"; a third, Skumi, "The Charred Portion of a Half-Consumed Log."

539 The following Kimsquit story[11] describes the obtaining of 575 an a'alk prerogative in the distant past.

Long ago, there lived in Kimsquit a young chief who was a great hunter. On one occasion, he was camping in a cave, Anokokwläls, on the mountains when not only its roof, but the dome of the sky as well, opened so that he was able to gaze into the upper regions of space. From this manifestation of the supernatural, he took for himself the name Älkwi, "The Opening of the Upper Regions," and validated it by giving valuable presents. This name has been transmitted from generation to generation and was recently brought to the present owner by his wife. With it is the prerogative of distributing potlatch gifts outside the house since the first Älkwi claimed that the sky itself was his only ceiling. 539 575 [551] [424]

A few years after Älkwi had had this experience, he and his three brothers left Kimsquit by canoe to hunt mountain goats at Suxwälk. To their surprise, a gull perched on the bow of their canoe; they did not scare it away, thinking it indicated a manifestation of the supernatural. At intervals it left its perch and circled around the canoe, but soon returned. As they neared the landing-place, the gull flew ashore and changed into a yearling mountain goat. Älkwi told his brothers, of whom the second was named Älkexa and the third O'miäsl, that he believed this to be a further visitation of the supernatural to himself and that he would investigate it, and later meet them at Anokokwläls.

Älkwi leapt ashore and followed the yearling goat. Wherever the road was rough, his strange guide travelled slowly so that his human companion could follow him. At length they came to a deep chasm with sheer walls about six feet apart, and a ledge running along one side. Älkwi followed the goat along this, until the animal leapt across the gorge, struck the face of the precipitous rock, and vanished. It was clear that he had passed into the interior of the mountain and the chief could hear the distant sound of a drum.

"I can die but once," he said to himself.

Then the brave hunter leapt across the chasm, struck the rock, and passed through it as if it had been tissue paper, to find himself in a vast cavern amid a large number of people. These were really animals who had gathered to await the coming of his guide, the yearling goat. The latter told him not to be afraid, that henceforth he would be under the protection of all animals and would not come to harm, no matter how often he hunted. With breathless interest, Älkwi watched the performance of a nusqual dance, for every yearling goat is a supernatural dancer of this type. The ceremony lasted throughout the night, and next morning he set out for Anokokwläls, not realizing that it was really a year since he had left his brothers. [825]

Meanwhile, though the three brothers had almost despaired of their elder's safe return, they patiently remained at their post, and after a year were overjoyed to see smoke rising from Anokokwläls. They hurried

539 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ätkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ätkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anokokwäls was a good place for a ceremony because Ätkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[11] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ätkwi danced [535] a nusqwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nusqwal dance.

In later years, Ätkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that [551] by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest brother the name, Nustakwalämi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ätkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcopinäti, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcopinäti, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the sisaok, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[12] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural rite, nusäxkämx. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and indebtedness. February is the proper month for nusäxkämx, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use some of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a nusäxkämx dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a nusäxkämx name is not embodied in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Ťopiwac, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Qplon, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the ceremony. The child singers first beat out the song of the present donor, then that of his predecessor, to which the latter dances once again. If food is plentiful, nusäxkämx ceremonies may be carried out every day for several weeks, or a year or two may elapse without one. A child's song is remembered from year to year and he dances whenever it is beaten out. The name acquired in this way is used semi-jocularly by a lad's comrades. After marriage, it is considered unfitting for a youth to be concerned with nusäxkämx and he normally becomes an a'alk.

Ceremonies of this kind have been discontinued for many years and it was impossible to obtain detailed accounts. The main features are clear: they served to instruct children in the methods of present-giving. According to one informant, there were two types of nusäxkämx ceremonial; one of the humorous pattern above described in which, however, food alone was given away, and another in which miniature presents were distributed. This man believed that the latter was only possible for the children of wealthy chiefs, and that on such occasions the themes consisted of small incidents in the family myth. In either case, the importance of ceremonial can be judged from the manner in which it was impressed upon mere children.

* 539 and Qwax, the Raven. The former flew ahead to clear a path down the mountain slope for Yuyulk"mai. At that time there was no sun, everything was dark and bleak. As they descended the mountain, they remembered that they had forgotten to bring from above the sticks for making fire which Sinx had promised them. So Raven assumed the form of a deer, returned to the upper regions, collected the desired appliances, and rejoined his companions below. Sinx had given Yuyulk"mai a stone hammer to use in making a salmon-weir, so he chose a site near the river, where the village of Ālqālāxi now stands, and built a house of evergreen boughs. The perpetual gloom annoyed Raven so that he determined to release light, sxem, which he knew was in a container in the house above. Once again he ascended and succeeded in uncovering the light of the sun which has since shone forth on this world. From this Raven took for himself the name, Qunqwinim uldidā sxem.

When Yuyulk"mai awoke after the first night in his new house, he found a salmon-weir ready for him, built by Sinx while he was sleeping. That night he slept again, but nothing had altered in the morning.

* 539 During the day, Sinx appeared to Yuyulk"mai, saying:

● 551 "I bring you the name, Sinxālotla. When you give a potlatch, carve my face on your totem-pole."

The next day Sinx came again.

"I bring you the name, Sinxākila," he said. "When you give a potlatch, carve my face on the bench where the chiefs sit."

The third day Sinx appeared once more, saying:

"I bring you the name, Ānuxemlaix. When you give a potlatch, paint my face on the back wall of your house."

Next day Sinx appeared in the form of a stump with numerous radiating roots, scoured and polished by the river.

"You will have the name Alqexqi'djut,"[4] he said. "If you find a hammer used in the construction of salmon-weirs, you will know that other people are living above you on the river. Put abalone-shell on the hammer."

* 539 With these instructions Sinx went away and never came back.

In course of time, when the population of the earth increased, Yuyulk"mai became rich and invited the people to a potlatch. The name he used on this occasion was Sinxālotla and he carved the face of Sinx on his totem-pole, as he had been instructed to do. A few years later he gave another potlatch, with the name Sinxākila, and this time he carved Sinx's face on the bench where the chiefs sat. When he gave [192] [4] Meaning, "A glance downwards." It is the word used when a person looks downwards between his legs, or over his shoulders, a reference to the manner in which Sinx, from aloft, watches the actions of mortals.

his third rite he validated the name Ānuxemlaix, and he had Sinx's face painted on the back wall of his house. Yuyulk"mai's fourth and last potlatch was given in the name of Ālqexqī'djut. This time he erected as a totem-pole a bare stick, presumably in reference to the appearance of Sinx as a tree-trunk.[5] 539*

When Yuyulk"mai came to Mount Nus·mātllaix he was accompanied by his old father, Ṭciknutl, his younger brother Diqom'notl, and a still younger sister, Kimilkān. These three went away at once to the Skeena River, taking with them some of the large cone-shaped whistles which they had brought with them as a present from the supreme god. The people living on the Skeena desired these articles so greatly that they quarrelled and fought for them, disgusting Ṭciknutl and Kimilkān so much that they determined to return.[6] But Ṭciknutl was too old to travel. His daughter had a copper upon which she thrust her aged father, and then placed it firmly against the under side of a rock which was suspended without visible support a few feet above the ground. Ṭciknutl was wedged between boulder and copper, and there he died. Kimilkān retraced her steps back to Bella Coola, to the summit of Mount Nus·mātllaix, whence she took flight back to the land above.

Meanwhile Diqom'notl was prospering. He lived in a copper shelter on the shore of a river with a copper raven, Snuqwaxwāls, perched on the roof of his house where it could peer over the edge into the river beneath to see the salmon, Snusumkāls, and the salmon, Snusumlkānk'. Diqom'notl was able to give potlatches at which he made for himself the name Ao·sti, and the sisaok name, Łāliāmx. One of the songs which he used was composed as if it were sung by the copper itself: the themes of others were Snuqwaxwāls, Snusumkāls, and Snusumlkānk'. [551]

At last Diqom'notl became weary of the Skeena and determined to visit Yuyulk"mai. Travelling in a copper canoe he soon reached the mouth of the Pe·sls where he found no one. From this experience he created for himself the name, U·sḥāxus, which means, "There is Nothing." Diqom'notl proceeded on foot to Sinxl, where he met Yuyulk"mai to whom he told his adventures. [551]

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Ālqāläxl[7]

In the beginning there came down to the western slope of Mount Nus·mātllaix three brothers, whose names, in relative order of their ages, [551]

[5]The names which occur in this myth are still in use.

[6]Another version states that they married and settled on the Skeena where their descendants still live; it is said that their origin myths record their Bella Coola ancestry.

From this he took for himself the name, Yelyelhuslaix, "The Face Cleanser." 539*

According to another informant the first settler at Ālqālāxl was Xemxemtnim who brought with him a moosehide and a model of Nusmāt·a. He set up this house and it expanded or contracted according to his wish.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Slskistl[9]

Among the first people to be sent down to this earth was Ḳril. For some time he lived on the north side of the Bella Coola River near its mouth; then with his sister, Ānusyalaix, and a herald he moved across to Slskistl, at the base of the mountain on the south shore of the river. He had a daughter who married a son of Xemxemtnim, living on the north side of the river. To their child he gave the name Noamtāxaik.

About this time Ālkwi, a Snulle·tl chief, lost Alqcālas, a stake decorated with abalone-shells which he used for his salmon-trap. It floated down into Ḳril's country where Ānusyalaix saw it, and advised her brother to take possession of it. Ḳril did so gladly because of its beautiful decoration, without knowing what it was or whence it came. He took it home and displayed it to many of his neighbours, but no one could tell him what it was. In honour of this event Ḳril gave his son the name Alqcālas, which has since been handed down in his family. Ālkwi followed downstream after his stake, but failed to overtake it before Ḳril had obtained it; so it was never returned to its rightful owner. [551]

FRAGMENT OF A Ḳomqo·ts ORIGIN MYTH[10]

In the beginning Ālqunlām sent down from Nusmāt·a to Mount Nus·lāxum, on the south side of the Bella Coola River, about one and a half miles from the sea, four brothers: the eldest, Xemlaix or Laqwomais; the second whose name is unknown; the third, ux·lqolam; and the youngest, ux·wunaisa. They each came in the form of some animal, bringing with them a miniature salmon-weir, which they set up in the river near where they had settled. ux·wunaisa had brought with him the prerogative of punishing violators of taboos connected with the river. The four brothers lived for some time at the base of the mountain until jealousy arose among them and the eldest moved to Ḳomqo·ts. There he caught innumerable salmon in the river so he was soon able to give them to people all over the world. It seemed as if the earth were tilted so that all its [551]

539 wealth flowed in upon him; accordingly he took for himself the name Sitlenlix which has this significance. Since he was the eldest and chief [551] of the four brothers the name has always been considered the most exalted in Xemqo-ti.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Snaloli[11]

In the beginning of time Ilqanxlm created the forefathers of all mankind in his house above and then asked each in what form he wished to go to earth. A number of bird and animal cloaks were hanging on the walls of the house, and each was invited to take his choice. One whose name was Kalilxlx chose the raven. When he had donned the garment he became a raven. Slowly he circled down from above in long spirals, carrying with him his two younger brothers and a sister, all in raven form, as a bird carries its young. He set down the two small brothers on the top of a flat mountain near Snaloli where he told them to remain, adding:

"I am going to the east but will return."

He brought back some abalone-shells, which he set down near the diminutive ravens, saying:

"Stay here, I am going to the west but will return."

This time he brought back with him some copper, that flashed in the sun.

Kalilxlx and his two brothers now assumed human form and sent their raven cloaks floating back to the land above. This was what happened to all the bird and animal forms used by the first people. The three descended the mountain and built their house by the Bella Coola River at the spot now known as Snaloli. Kalilxlx had brought with him a mountain goat, which, when set at liberty, bred with great rapidity, so that these first Snaloli people subsisted largely on goat flesh, the provision made for them by Ilqanxlm. In some inexplicable manner it appears that the supernatural hunter Tsualklit, whose other name is Lelemkile, "The One Who Throws Down [Goats]," had come with this group. Kalilxlx had such success in hunting that he was able to give a potlatch and bestow valuable presents of goat meat, goat grease, and woollen blankets. At this ceremony he took for himself the xnaak name, Kallalimdimat, "The Copper One," because when returning from the west the raven had covered himself with copper, so that it seemed as if he were made of it.[12]

During his lifetime, though whether before or after his potlatch, it is impossible to state, Kalilxlx determined to obtain light for mankind, act as guide against his masters. The man led in the party under cover of a fog which lifted at an inopportune moment, but the slave deceived the Fort Rupert Indians into believing that his comrades were not hostile. Kāmālsong[w] rewarded the guide with a marten-skin coat and one of marmot-skins. 539*

When he gave a potlatch, Kāmālsong[w] had the back wall of his house decorated with pictures of sun and moon, while he himself wore a grizzly bear-skin with its head above his own. As he danced, there rose through the floor a large box on which was painted a raven. Kāmālsong[w] went to the receptacle and took from it sufficient presents to supply the requirements of the visitors from one tribe, the Bella Bella, for example. Then the box would sink from sight, only to reappear with gifts for another group; this was repeated as many times as there were parties of guests from outside places. This was the method of procedure decreed by Alqunstm.

These first Nusqalst people made a number of special objects for their potlatches. As a representation of the five-peaked mountain beneath which they lived, they erected five peaks over the front of their house, a custom which has been carried out until the present day. Projecting from one of them was a figure of a mountain goat, since that animal was brought to earth to serve as food by their first ancestors. They also made a number of large stone spoons, which, after being used for many generations, were buried with a certain Paitu about 1875. These utensils were of a type used by Nusqalst before he became a mountain, and were later copied by the carpenter-masons. [424] [415]

Kāmālsong[w] was so powerful that he altered a nusuk rite of his potlatch into a kusiut dance, changed Nusmāt-a to a kusiut name, and decreed that the repository should be under the spot where his house stood. For this ceremonial he always used a whistle with the voice of a raven.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nusqalst

(Second version dealing with another settlement)[18]

Nusqalst is a chief among mountains. Like a human leader, it has several names, Tsāhwaāks, Sāsutlum, and others; these names belong to several persons now living. Like a person, too, the mountain was sent down from above at the beginning of the world to Tsowat, Bute Inlet, whence it moved to its present position midway up the Bella Coola valley, a location which it had heard was a pleasant one. * 539 In course of time, as they grew wealthy, they were able to summon people from far and near for potlatches. This in turn enabled them to validate several names which they had brought from above. Ālqanstm had given Nusmālurwai a box containing whistles for kusiut rites. He used these and bestowed on one of his sisters the name Nuwarmray, a kusiut designation still in existence. When the roof of the house was opened light shone through, from which circumstance the name Sgsnil was acquired at one of their annual potlatches. Not only was Nusmālurwai able to validate designations which Ālqanstm had given him, but he created several new ones as well. He gave to his sisters the names Kālgsmāknm and Sgpmpmān·a; the latter means "Rising Dust," with reference to the dust rising from the floor of the house as Nusmālurwai threw down the moosehides which he was about to give away to his guests.

[551] All the names mentioned in this myth have been preserved. That of Nusmālurwai is held in especial esteem by the people of Stuix. It means "Head of the River," referring to the point where he came to this [552] earth. Even Thmstadimut is still in use, applied to a dog as the owner has no children.

THIRD ORIGIN MYTH OF Stuix[m]

In the beginning Ālqanstm sent down to Smaisu·a, at the head of the Clearwater, a branch of the Bella Coola River, four brothers, Ālkwi, Dudusmq', Nānātskwi, and one whose name has been forgotten, with their sisters, Kāwilkas and O'wielkas. Dudusmq' had brought with him from above as a present from Ālqanstm some olachen in concentrated form and one of the large cone-shaped whistles used in kusiut ceremonials. The two women cried because they had no house. But presently they thought they were in one with a wonderfully painted roof; in reality it was the sky and the decorations were brightly shining stars. By means of their supernatural power, for they were not yet mortals, they reduced the firmament to such small compass that it was really a house to them, with the star-illuminated sky as roof. Taking this abode with them, the six set out next day for Tsowut, a point on the mainland opposite the north end of Vancouver Island. They travelled down the valley of a river which rises not far from the Smaisu·a source of the Bella Coola. Ālkwi and his relatives did not like the language of the people living at Tsowut, so they returned to Smaisu·a, taking with them some of the fine

*539 532 before he came to this world. It was a large pole and stood across the sidewalk from the house, not being pierced by the doorway. At the base was a grizzly bear, with paws wrapped around it as if desirous of climbing after the food which could be seen higher up. Immediately above the bear was an eagle's nest with four fledglings standing amid their broken eggshells and craning their necks eagerly upwards to greet the mother eagle flying back with a salmon. At the top of the pole was a ball, Nuxpemda, representing the container in which the sun was enclosed; it was this that Raven broke to release light to mortals. The name of the pole was Ałikuł.[a]

[551] The names contained in this myth are still in use. Kānilku was the relator of it; her nuxuł song deals with Smaiu-a and, since the salmon enter Bella Coola River in hopes of reaching this place, salmon are used in the decorations of her house. The name Dadzuxuy' varies; it becomes Mázuxuy' when applied to a youth, and Mázuxuy'ax-a for a girl.

FOURTH ORIGIN MYTH OF Stax[b]

*539 Long, long ago there was in a mysterious place far to the east and far above this world, a very large house, Nulotómais, in which dwelt together all people, Bella Coola, Bella Bella, Carriers, and the rest. In it there lived too, all kinds of birds, including the thrush who taught each its song. [829] The chief of the house, Sikaw by name, lived there too and gave to each tribe its special language. One day he decided to visit the earth, and dived from his house downwards, becoming the sun. In this guise he came to earth on Mount Naya, near Stax, where he became a man and built for himself a house which was a copy of Nulotómais, and to which he gave the same name. Sikaw became prosperous and gave many potlatches.

FRAGMENT OF A Snuilx-il ORIGIN MYTH[c]

In the beginning of time, Ałpuxtu, in guise of the sun, sent down to earth a number of brothers with their one sister. Their names have been forgotten except that of the oldest man, Tulałmula, who had brought with him a beaver as provender. He released the animal, which multiplied to provide abundant food for all; it became the ancestor of all the beaver of the upper valley. Owing to their position higher up the Bella Coola, Tsiskwale and his brothers considered that they were nearer to the sun than any of the people dwelling below, a fact of which they were exceedingly proud. Moreover, having been sent down by him, the sun was their crest. 539 X

There were two large boulders in the river near the settlement, which Sqamtsin had shown Tsiskwale how to use as supports for a salmon-weir. With the help of his brothers, a hole was drilled in one of the rocks; then they felled a large tree upstream and allowed it to drift down until the butt lodged in the perforated boulder and the head swung across against the other. With this as base, other trunks were woven in upright so that the river was almost spanned and a fine dam constructed. In this they caught so many salmon that Tsiskwale and his brothers were able to call people from far and near to potlatches and feast them liberally on the fish. In course of time their sister was married to a chief from another town. Henceforth, whenever one of her brothers gave a potlatch, he was able to rebuy his sister on a lavish scale with the teeming salmon. The sun had taught the woman a song for such occasions, which has since been used as a prerogative by her descendants when rebuying themselves from their husbands. [424] [583]

Tsiskwale made a long voyage of exploration during which he reached the Skeena River. He made friends with the inhabitants of the town, Kitwanga, who gave him the name, Xwulkw,[*] meaning whale in their language. Continuing his journey, he ultimately circled the earth before returning home. He obtained several other designations, including Ailumka from the Kwatna people.[]

Years after the settlement of Snalk'al, the drilled stone supporting the salmon-weir broke and the ruins were swept away downstream. The people cut their hair and blackened their faces in mourning, then moved to Sinur where a number of their daughters had married chiefs.

Arma, two brothers, Snaykākila and Miaī'sila, with their sister, Sللsلān·i. Ālqunūm had provided them with means of sustenance; Sللsلān·i brought cranberries and Miaī'sila a model salmon-trap, such as is used in salt water. The three had no house, but Ālqunūm sent them some logs of driftwood from which Snaykākila constructed a shelter, which they called Yentsānī because it was made of flotsam. On the roof Snaykākila placed a huge copper with which the smoke vent could be closed, and immediately above the door a wooden loon kept calling incessantly. 539*

When they had been on this earth for some time Snaykākila became a shaman from the sight of a copper house that rose from the depths of the ocean in mid-channel. He paddled out to it in his canoe, climbed to the roof on a conveniently placed ladder, and went from the roof down inside. Then he discovered that it was the house of Ḳemaqma, who was sitting in the middle behind the fire, his long hair protruding from beneath his huge hat. All around the walls were paintings of different denizens of the water world, and various creatures were sharing the house. As Snaykākila stood by the front door looking inwards he saw on his right a number of seals sitting around a small fire in one corner of the house. In the opposite corner, on his left, also by a fire, was a very old woman; in some unexplained manner Snaykākila knew that her name was Nuixwanaix. In the right-hand rear corner a man, Nuiqual, was seated by his fire, and in the remaining corner, by a fourth fire, was another man, Nuuxemlaix. Xaqānts, the Heron, was stalking back and forth behind the fire; as his dignified gait shows, he is a chief, and as such has the chiefly names, Numelsdmut, ᵘmappātsdjut, Ānuxlnmdmut, and Ānuicellāmdmut. Near the left wall, opposite the fire, was a large box, Snulkānāls, containing heavy coppers, tsānkdmut, and mice, which gnawed incessantly. A porcupine and a grizzly bear were playing together in the back-room. Halibut was lying outside the front door so that anyone jumping down outside leaped through its open mouth into its stomach. Whale was likewise lying outside, parallel to the front wall of the house. The totem-pole of this strange house was Kdsta, a supernatural ocean being. [551]

From his seat behind the fire Ḳemaqma greeted Snaykākila in a kindly fashion. The chief wrapped some of his own hair around a stick and pulled, thus breaking off a few strands, which he gave to his guest. He then told him to take three names for the use of himself and his children forever: they were, Tsānkdmut, the coppers, Āmkpls, the mice, and Snulkānāls, the box in which these were contained. After spending a few hours with Ḳemaqma, Snaykākila returned to land, whereupon a gale arose and the house sank beneath the waves. [551]

*539 In course of time Snaxhākila became so wealthy that he was able to call people from far and near for a potlatch. He built a house identical in every particular with that of Ḷomoqwa as he had seen it. He bestowed on his children not only the names which Ḷomoqwa gave to him, but also [551] two which he took from what he had seen, Ḳ'unts, the whale which was outside the front of the house, and Łaliāhs, the significance of which could not be determined.

[552] These two designations have since been transmitted in this family, and now been bestowed on a dog, there being no children left.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Tāl·io[22]

In the beginning of time, Ālquntām sent down to this world a man, Āl·imlsaix, with his two sisters, Ailsamka, "The Abalone-Shell Woman," and Alhlxān·istlliax, "The One with Abalone on Her Hat." The three landed on an island several miles in circumference, formed of an enormous abalone-shell; its location is now unknown, but it was somewhere in the south, presumably not far from Vancouver. Here they dwelt for some time and began to construct a house for themselves out of the shell. All the time they longed to travel in search of a desirable place to settle, but they lacked means of transportation. At this juncture Raven appeared, and offered them a canoe if they would promise to use it. They readily agreed and presently the supernatural bird returned with one. It was a sḳāmtsk, one of the mythical monsters who live beneath the ocean and suck down small craft by opening their mouths.

Āl·imlsaix and his sisters embarked. They had decorated their hats and blankets with abalone-shell and took with them a large store of the same material. Raven perched on the bow and croaked whenever they drew near a landing-place. After travelling a considerable distance, they saw smoke rising, and presently noticed a house. Āl·imlsaix landed to investigate and found it occupied by a solitary woman, Ṭlakwakilayakwa; the place where she lived was called Nuqwdlax, probably on Schooner Pass. Āl·imlsaix asked her to accompany the party as his sister (meaning here a non-marriageable female relative, not an own sister). She agreed after much discussion. The four continued their travels until they drew near Fort Rupert, where they saw more smoke. As before, Āl·imlsaix landed and found another solitary woman, Kwal'kila'yakwa, whom he also persuaded to join the group as his sister. The five now passed on to Rivers Inlet, where Raven vanished. The others thought he had left them but, unknown to them all, he had entered Ṭlakwakilayakwa's body. They paddled as far as the lake at the head of Rivers Inlet where they abandoned their craft and set out on foot along the overland path to the head of South Bentinck Arm. 539*

Midway along this trail the travellers saw a house, called Tcäkwalotl because it could lengthen itself at will. From this supernatural sight each of the five became a shaman. This house was a replica of the one above in which mankind was made and, like it, contained many rooms, in each of which lived an individual speaking a different language. Äl·imlsaix failed to understand them and in his annoyance scattered the speakers, who fled to different parts of the coast where each increased and perpetuated his own language. This is why the various coastal tribes have their own tongues; if Äl·imlsaix had been able to understand them in Tcäkwalotl there would be no diversity of speech now. [829]

Various dances were taking place in the rooms within the house. There was a constant din from the large whistles used in sisaok ceremonial which sounded of their own accord and were continually answered by Echo. Only at this place and at Nusqalst did Echo appear to the first people; hence only the descendants of Äl·imlsaix and of the Nusqalst people have the right to portray him in their dances. Äno°likwolsaix (II, p. 8) stood near the door; when at last she called out, the sisaok whistles became silent as if in fear. [424] [535]

Continuing their journey the travellers reached Täl·io, at the head of South Bentinck Arm, where a solitary man, Nusxemda, was living. At this place Ťlakwakilayakwa gave birth to Raven, who was born as a boy with the legs of a raven. Äl·imlsaix named him ixlqotlamsqwaxdjinas. After a short sojourn at Täl·io they ascended the river, and presently Äl·imlsaix saw a female grizzly bear, whom he also invited to join the party as his sister. The bear accepted and he endeavoured to change the creature to a woman. He had fair success with the paws and face; that is why these parts of a bear are similar to those of men at the present day, but the beast's hairy hide defied his efforts and in disgust he told it to run away. Before banishing it, he bade the animal always show a friendly disposition to human beings, wherefore grizzly bears at Täl·io have never been known to attack a person. The party proceeded up the river to Mount Step', where Äl·imlsaix found a repository (II, p. 8) through the discovery of which he became a Cannibal with the name Snunkka°ks and an eagle as incubus. From this point they returned to Täl·io, where they settled permanently. [825]

Many of the names which occur in this myth are still in use. Mrs. Schooner's designation as chief is Ťlakwakilayakwa, a name that can be used by either man or woman; in the former case the suffix yakwa is 551

551 dropped. Kwaï'hila'yokwɔ is held by a Fort Rupert chief. Several kusiut names, with dances, were obtained from Tcäkwälotl where the travellers saw them being performed; among them were Änudakänuts and Duduspux, which are now used by two Bella Coola women. Ailsamka is now a Cannibal (II, p. 71) name. At Täl·io Äl·imdsaix gave a kusiut dance, and with his own power made there a repository as if he had brought it with him from Tcäkwalotl. This was only possible because of his supernatural power as one of the first people, strengthened by his becoming a shaman through seeing Tcäkwalotl.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Täl·io[34]

*539 In the beginning, there came down to the Skeena River,[35] Nusqäps, Nusxemda, Wiaqaii, and their younger sister Nulixwemankta; they brought from Älquntäm some of the large cone-shaped whistles used for sisaok ceremonials.[36] The three travelled all over the coast seeking a place in which to settle, and always the whistles kept calling out of their own accord, giving advice. Finally they decided to locate at Täl·io, the head of South Bentinck Arm.

When they had lived there for some time, the neighbours objected to the din of the whistles, which drove away olachen and herring, so Nusxemda built a high, narrow mound of refuse, on the tip of which he constructed his house. The building was peculiar; its door opened horizontally and used to close with a crash when anyone entered. On either side of the hill there lived a smnq, whose keen ears could hear the wailing of an infant at any distance. In those ancient days, these beasts were [776] like dogs and did not annoy mortals; they were servants to Nusxemda. One day he learnt that a raiding-party was approaching, but instead of being afraid he instructed the smnq to use their power when it drew near. When the hostile canoes came in sight the two creatures reversed their eyeballs, causing a blinding flash which stunned the occupants of the canoes. After a little they recovered consciousness and again came on, but again the smnq reversed their eyeballs with a like result. When this had happened several times the raiders withdrew discouraged.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Āxet·i[40]

In the beginning of time there came to Āxet·i, on the east side of the Dean River, about one mile from the sea, Sonxwāāks and his three younger brothers. They brought a stone hammer as their present from Ālquntām. After they had lived some time on this earth, Sonxwāāks asked Yulātimut to have a canoe ready for him on the morrow. By the next day Yulātimut had completed a fine craft. Sonxwāāks was delighted and spent four days fitting it out; then set out with his three younger brothers for a trip to the far north, where he knew by report that abalone-shells were to be found.[41] The four did not know the route and were constantly penetrating into fiords from which there was no exit; however, they persevered and were helped by all whom they encountered, Sonxwāāks's name being well known. After a month's voyage, they reached their goal. They found themselves before a lofty precipice falling sheer into the ocean with a cavern visible in it at very low tide. This they boldly entered. At first they were deluged with falling star-fish; in fact, their canoe would have been sunk by the weight of these if the youngest brother had not held up his cedar-bark cloak to ward them off. A little farther on they found countless abalone-shells, with which they swiftly filled the canoe, fearing lest the tide should rise sufficiently to prevent their return if they stayed to investigate further. Once safely outside they camped, and the eldest brother took the opportunity to bestow names on the younger brothers for things they had seen or done on the way. He called his second brother Nuswin·āmx, "The Warrior," as if he had fought against the abalone; the third Ālus·limān, "Falling Star-Fish," and the youngest Ālusqax, "The Roof-Maker," a reference to the

ORIGIN MYTH OF Siwal·os[45]

Soon after the first people had reached this earth Älquntäm feared that as they increased, they might quarrel about land tenure. Accordingly he sent down to Siwal·os, on the Dean River thirty-five miles from the sea, three brothers, Älquntäm, ʒyuyuyut, and Łäliäxsa, a name in many [551] cases used by women, with their sister Sxaþe·tl. He gave the oldest brother instructions to divide the land among the different villages. Älquntäm came in the guise of a mountain goat, but promptly sent his animal cloak back to the land above, before starting downstream. To the inhabitants of each town he allotted certain valleys in the vicinity to serve as hunting-grounds, and told the people that these, and only these, were to be theirs forever. After reaching the coast, he travelled down Dean Inlet as far as the Bella Bella country, likewise allotting land to the different settlements, and marking each boundary with a stick. After finishing his task, Älquntäm returned up the Dean River to his brothers. The three built a weir that spanned the river, and in it they caught so many steel-head salmon that the Carriers used to come from great distances to buy from them. Sxaþe·tl was married to a chief living on the lower part of the river, and her brothers, too, came below for their wives. Älquntäm ultimately moved to Nusqäþts, on the east side of the Dean River, twenty-five miles from the sea.

ʒyuyuyut had come from above in the form of a deer. After taking [825] off this cloak, he released it as an animal, which became the ancestor of all the deer near Kimsquit. They did not like Siwal·os, where it was very cold, so they moved to Nihtcks, on Dean Inlet, about three miles below Kimsquit, and there built their town. Unfortunately, the snowfall was so heavy that they had much trouble in lighting their fires; sometimes as much as ten feet of snow fell in a single night.

"Please, Łäliäxas," said the deer, "don't keep falling on us."

In the language of men, snow is kai, and Łäliäxas means, "Copper One," but the language of deer is quite different. The snow, unmoved by their appeals, continued to fall, until at last the deer held a meeting and resolved to move away to the outer coast near Bella Bella, and never [825] return again. They carried out this plan, and it is only within the last few years that some have come back, although for centuries none lived near Kimsquit.

*539 [551] The names embodied in this myth are still in use. That of Noākila was validated at a potlatch during the winter of 1921, after being dormant since the death of the eighth Noākila, an old man, which had taken place some thirty years previously.[50] To illustrate this myth a representation is made of the merganser canoe, a specimen of which, obtained by Mr. Harlan I. Smith, is now in the National Museum, Ottawa.

According to another version of this myth, Noākila and his party came to earth at Anaham Lake, in the country of the Carriers, bringing with them the steel-head salmon. They first went to Stuix, but Noākila did not like the place, so released only a few of the fish. They returned to Anaham Lake, and from there went to Salmon House. They found this spot so desirable that they settled and set free their store of steel-head salmon. That is the reason why this fish is so plentiful in the Dean River, and so relatively rare in the Bella Coola. [825]

ORIGIN MYTH OF Sā·tsk'[51]

In the beginning of time Älquntäm constructed an abalone-shell covered post which reached from Nusmät·a to Älwolsqämus, a mountain near the Kimsquit River, not far from its mouth. To this place came from above two men, Smaoan, "The First One," and his younger brother, Omqomkilıka. The former flew down as an eagle, but the latter, in raven form, swarmed down the post, which vanished after he had reached the earth. Smaoan spread his wings, like a mother bird, to shelter his younger brother. Älquntäm had given Omqomkilıka a box containing sockeye salmon, with instructions to throw them into the ocean, where they would increase rapidly to serve as food for him and his elder brother. He also taught the two how to build a salmon-weir to catch the fish. The brothers climbed down the mountain-side to the mouth of the Kimsquit River, where Omqomkilıka became a man and sent back his raven cloak above. He then released the salmon as he had been instructed, and also another present from Älquntäm, a mätsqus (I, p. 525), which was to serve as bait not only for fish but also for wealth and goods.

Smaoan declined to assume human form immediately, so began to travel, and his younger brother, sad at being thus left alone, started to [173] [50]This was the only instance given of an approximation of the interval since the first peopling of the earth. The Bella Coola usually reply, "long, long ago," and have not questioned further. This myth was received from a reliable informant, but it is doubtful whether his statement concerning the "eighth" Noākila would find credence among most Bella Coola. Even if it should be the eighth, that would be of little value in estimating the period at which the Bella Coola believe the earth to have been populated, since names may remain dormant for generations.

* 539 [551] potlatches,[14] at which he validated names for his children. One of these was Äs·ɣänam, the designation he had applied to his salmon-weir; it has been used by his descendants as a child's name ever since. As time went on, when his children grew into manhood, he obtained for them seats in the house and also procured wives for them. His eldest son, whose mother was Sximäna, had the names Łäloxmän·a, the meaning of which is unknown, and Äluskmän·aix, "The Most Important of All Chiefs' Sons." Smaoan had arranged marriages for this young man with four women, but Łäloxmän·a was so ugly that only one of his wives, as ugly as himself, would have anything to do with him. His only real friend was a younger brother, Älkexa, aged about twelve years, who was his constant companion.

One day Łäloxmän·a became so embittered and disgusted at his own ugliness that he went away, determined never to return, and not caring whither he went. As provisions he carried only a goat bladder filled with goat marrow. This prevents hunger and is said never to become exhausted, no matter how long the hunter may be absent. Älkexa saw his elder brother depart, and decided to accompany him. Łäloxmän·a allowed him to come with him for about ten miles, up the valley of the Kimsquit River, where he shot some mergansers which he asked Älkexa to take back as a present to his parents. The younger boy was unwilling, nor could he be dissuaded from following, even when Łäloxmän·a told him he was going off to die.

So the two camped for the night, and next morning continued their journey up the valley of the Kimsquit River, a region then unknown. Łäloxmän·a was very sad at the thought of the hardships which his younger brother would have to endure, but he could see no way in which to persuade him to return. On and on they pressed, camping at night, their only food being the goat marrow which Łäloxmän·a carried. Far up the river they followed an affluent from the left, and from its valley climbed the bare mountain which, though they knew it not, is the watershed between the Kimsquit and Kitlobe rivers. Here, above the tree-line, they met a wolf. It lowered its ears, hummed, walked a few paces along a path, stopped, and looked back, as if it wished to guide the two wanderers. They decided to follow the animal which, once assured that [811] [14] Although the Bella Coola are sufficiently logical to demand an explanation for everything, once a belief has been formulated they cease to inquire whether it is possible. Thus, in all these accounts of the first people, the reader wonders how there were enough people in the world so soon after its settlement to make potlatches possible. Who were the musicians? Who formed the bulk of the guests? Such questions do not strike the Bella Coola as obvious; the stories have been handed down as facts, and they believe that anything was possible in those early days before man had lost his supernatural power.

At this juncture someone saw a party of strangers, and wondered who they might be as they entered the town. There was great rejoicing when the two brothers told their parents who they were, for they had been so transformed that they were unrecognizable. As Sä·lma had said, Łäloxmän·a's three beautiful wives came rushing up, eager to have him take them back, but he paid no attention to them. He welcomed only the ugly one, who had mourned for him, and massaged her until she became the most lovely of all. 539*

Smaoan, delighted at the safe return of his sons, and proud of Łäloxmän·a's beautiful children, sent invitations far and near to a great potlatch. At this ceremony he validated, with many presents, a seat in the house for Łäloxmän·a. The name thus confirmed was Spätcaldt, "The First Born," a name given to Łäloxmän·a by Kapsälopst. Smaoan also took this opportunity to confer names on his numerous grandchildren. After sojourning for some time in Kimsquit, the Kitlobe people returned home, richly laden with gifts.

In the course of time Wisamkilak bore her husband two more children. Smaoan continued to prosper and to give potlatches, at one of which he gave one of his grandchildren the name Stältımx, "Chief." This designation at once became honourable on account of the goods expended. Łäloxmän·a did not wish to forget his Kitlobe friends, so in time he sent two of his children to live there. One of them was Stältımx, a name that has ever since remained there. Thus friendly relations between Kimsquit and Kitlobe, first opened by Łäloxmän·a, have been maintained. There have been many marriages between people of these two areas, each knows of Łäloxmän·a, and it was only about one hundred and fifty years ago that a Kimsquit woman, Ätsqtutl by name, was married to a Kitlobe man to repay the original marriage of Wisamkilak. [648] [582]

When Smaoan became old he gave yet another potlatch at which he took for himself the name Łilixwnimut, "The Scatterer." He created this from his own fertile imagination, with reference to the way in which he scattered eagle down when first travelling to the north in eagle form. It has since been used by his descendants when old. [551]

The descendants of Smaoan enjoy not only the prerogative of using this myth and the names included in it, but other privileges connected with it. If one of them gives a potlatch he carves the form of a mätsqus on the spoons to be used at it, and paints the wall of his house with a whale design. Omqomkilka's descendants are more likely than others to receive supernatural good fortune from a mätsqus. The descendants of both 539* 424 [532]

he travelled the whole distance on a single billow, so asked to be sent on a four-billow wave. His canoe was a sea-lion's stomach, into which he climbed through the mouth and which he made watertight by tying up the entrance with the animal's entrails. Whether or not the creature was alive is not clear, but at any rate the man set off in the strange craft. He felt as if he were on the back of an animal which made long, easy, slow bounds; it was the slow surging of a gigantic Pacific comber. After four bounds he untied the neck and found himself at home.

Certain names have been preserved from this myth. The name Nęqaqa is now used by a dog, as the owner is the last of her family. Another name is Ꞗlaxamxmitl, "The Crash," derived from the metallic sound of the closing door of the sea-lion house. The name Namutsta was also obtained inside the house, but the details of its significance are lost.

AN EARLY MYTH OF Kıldeˑt[79]

As has been said, ambitious individuals, especially if they lack origin myths of the customary kind, sometimes claim ordinary stories as such. The following is almost certainly a case in point. It was obtained from an unreliable informant, who claimed it as a family myth, and said he had used it at a potlatch. He asserted that it was a Bella Bella story, transmitted through the marriage of one of his ancestors with a Bella Bella woman. Another informant, well versed in Bella Bella folk-lore, recounted another version of the same myth as a mere tale. There seems little doubt that the first narrator had merely laid claim to a common story to supply the deficiency of a true myth.

In the beginning, there came down to earth at the head of Gas Bay, Kıldeˑt, a solitary man whose name was Kāsānˑa. He was so lonely that he made for himself from soft punky wood a woman, dressed her in blankets and clothing, and gave her the name, Ꞗaˑlems, which is in the Bella Bella language. Kāsānˑa was a great hunter; every day he went out to seek mountain goats, which provided him with great quantities of grease, as well as yarn that he wove into blankets. Before leaving the house he always placed Ꞗaˑlems in front of a loom, put food beside her and told her to eat as much as she liked and to work diligently.

Other people had come down to earth at the same time as Käsän·a, and among them a man and his wife who had landed at the mouth of Gas Bay. They had two daughters who, walking one day at the head of the bay, were surprised to find a house. They looked in and saw a woman, so entered, and laughed heartily to find her made of rotten wood. They kicked over the figure and the head fell into the fire and was burnt. Then they seated themselves in her place, worked diligently at the blanket and ate a large amount of the food. Towards dusk they put the figure back in place and hid themselves.

BB 539 BC 539 *

Soon Käsän·a entered. He embraced the figure, called her a good wife, and thanked her for weaving so diligently and for having eaten so much of the food. Then he saw that she had burnt her head, and chided her, saying that she must take better care of herself. At this the two girls who were hiding burst out laughing and showed themselves. They suggested to Käsän·a that he choose one of them for his wife; he agreed, selected the elder and married her. He built a house on a hilltop where they lived and to which he called people from far and near when he gave a potlatch.

Sisaok Origin Myths

As already stated, many sisaok names are believed to have come down from above with the first Bella Coola, or to have been created by them on this earth. In such cases, the sisaok origin myth is the same as the ancestral myth. Theoretically, names of the same type can also be received through visions in which a beholder is given his new designation by some supernatural being, or takes it from the apparition. In either case, of course, it must be duly validated by the giving of presents. Only three myths were obtained which deal solely with the acquisition of a sisaok prerogative. No doubt this is chiefly to be explained by the fact that most sisaok rites have been derived from the Bella Bella.

MARRIAGE RITES

Y's family decide when the period of engagement shall be terminated. Although it is considered undignified for X or his relatives to hurry them in this matter, there is always a certain amount of urging. Y's father has strong reasons for procrastination. A long engagement strengthens the status of the children whom his daughter may bear, and besides, he frequently receives presents from X's relatives. As Y's relatives will have to bear the heavier part of the expenses of the wedding, it may be necessary for them to delay it for years while saving the requisite goods. The ceremony may take place at any time of the year. Foreign guests are occasionally invited, but usually only the members of X's and Y's village are present. If the marriage should be with the child of a foreign chief his relatives and friends are present to take part. When Y's relations decide that they are ready, they choose the actual day after consultation with X's family, though the assumption is that Y's father merely informs X's father of the date. 584 585

It is incumbent on X's family to proclaim the event on the day preceding the ceremony. In the late afternoon his father sends a herald through the village calling out: 585 203

"Q̇wimap, ye chiefs! Q̇wimap, ye wives of chiefs! Q̇wimap, ye commoners!"

The actual meaning of q̇wimap is unknown, though it is well understood to be an invitation to gather for the announcement of a wedding. In conjunction with the summons, X's ancestral name is used, although all in the village are probably well aware of what is about to take place. It is noteworthy that at a marriage the guests, as well as the participants, are called by the ancestral names, as opposed to the kusiut ones by which individuals who own such are generally known. Red colouring is much in evidence at weddings; heralds smear their faces with red paint and the guests similarly tint themselves. They wear collars, wristlets, and anklets of undyed cedar-bark, and cover themselves with eagle down. [551] 585 [551] [302] [301]

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Ālquntäm to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yetsalt, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stältumx. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announcement was made: 553 556 583

"Y's belt has come to rebuy her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after amassing goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's anus has come to rebuy her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Snulle·tl have the prerogative of singing a special song as they rebuy one of their daughters. This was used by their first ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is: [424] [533]

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Snulle·tl is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them. [186]

After announcing the various relatives who have rebought Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551 553

551 with respect to their appearance or actions on this earth. As [553] far as could be learnt, the procedure of bestowal is identical with that just described. The following examples illustrate designations of this type:

Änäbsullänämlaix, "The Resident Maker." In the begin-[773] ning of time the wife of Ṭaiakwala had twins so often that the village rapidly increased in population. Accordingly she took this name for herself when she rebought herself from her husband. It was transmitted for generations in the ancestral family of Ṭaiakwala's descendants until lent about one hundred years ago. The recipients claimed it as their own and passed it to a certain Omqomkilka, recently deceased, who gave it to her brother's daughter at the time of her marriage. Since this woman's husband has not yet given a potlatch the name is accordingly in a degraded condition at the present time (1923).

551 Olliyaiyɔ, "I Am the Worthless One." The mother-in-law
578 of this woman had been in the habit of insulting her daughter-606 in-law by saying, even when strangers were present:

"We have a worthless daughter-in-law."

On rebuying herself the woman advertised the rudeness of her husband's mother by throwing her words back in her teeth.

Nulalulaks, "I Am the One Whose Eyes Are Hungry." The mother-in-law of this woman used to eat without offering food to her son's wife.

Nukokwixodjäx, "The One Whose Haunches Are Dusty." Her mother-in-law did not give her a place to sit in the house so that she was forced to stay close to the fire in the ashes.

Kwiläxlaix, "The One Who Sits Where There Is No Space." Her mother-in-law objected to this woman sitting near her husband when he took his ceremonial seat, and insulted her with the above remark.

551 Nunuaox'as, "The Stingy One." It was said that this 578 woman restrained her husband's generosity until he gained an unpleasant reputation for parsimony. She publicly shamed her husband's critics by taking this name for herself when she rebought herself from him. 551 578

Nu'aos, "The Inhospitable One." Her husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, so she advertised what had been said about him.

Nupłätlsikän, "Heedlessly Deaf." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear what she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name. [606]

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created. 553

A description has already been given of the actual ritual by which X bestows the goods acquired from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the sisaok or kusiut. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a sisaok, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said: 556 583 [558]

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the tried to incorporate as many of these as possible, so that the rite soon became a chorus of obscenities. The songs were sung and resung until all present were familiar with them, then the donor of the rite distributed food and all departed. 586 626 837 796

The following afternoon everyone, including those uninitiated into either society, were invited to the donor's house. Probably the only absentees from the village were the deserting wife and her lover, while guests from neighbouring settlements were often in attendance. On this occasion, for the first time, the deserted husband used to take the leading part. When the singers struck up the tune of the first song, he used to appear, supported by four or five assistants. His face was blackened with soot, he wore a lynx-skin belt, and above his head was fashioned some insulting object, usually a representation of the female organs made of wood, cedar-bark and berries, as realistic as possible. As the singers sang, aided by those who had learnt the songs on the previous day, the husband danced, moving his body so that the ornament on top of his head was shaken suggestively. Meanwhile the spectators kept calling out filthy epithets of any kind on his ex-wife and her lover. Sometimes the dancer was able to insert some obscene remarks into the display. On one occasion, for example, he pulled some lynx fur from his belt and threw it in the face of a Tāl-io man who happened to be present, and who had once seduced a married woman and accordingly been the butt of a similar rite, with the remark: [302] [292]

"All Tāl-io women have hairy pudenda like that."

The guests were invited to suggest foul nick-names for the man with whom the dancer's wife had eloped. One of these was adopted by general agreement of opinion, and the man was commonly called by it henceforth. Two names so created were: [551]

Skulxes, "The One Whose Face is Wrinkled like a Woman's Organs," and, Emslxaik, "The One Who Cohabited Publicly."

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

588 556 mate object. Bella Coola financiers are always seeking to arrange such undertakings; the potlatch is the culminating point, but the same principle pervades their whole life.

It is to the advantage of the intending donor of a potlatch to become the fictitious husband of as many children as possible. Accordingly he sometimes take the initial step, as is customary for the relatives of the husband in real marriage, but not in ceremonial. In such a case it is necessary for him to offer some inducement, perhaps in the form of one of the few women's names brought to earth in the beginning of time. He approaches a suitable father-in-law, suggesting that at a fictitious marriage he would be willing to give his wife a noble woman's name. If this is agreeable, the rite is carried out accordingly. The wife is in many cases a son of the person to [551] whom the proposal was made; he duly receives a woman's name, the only circumstance under which this is possible. The actual designation will probably be returned through many repurchasings, but the boy has reached an enviable position. In later years he can always silence a person with whom he is quarrelling by saying:

"I need not answer you. You cannot even approach my body, so thickly am I padded with the goods which my father used when he rebought me."

556 608 858 Another business transaction of a similar nature is the giving of a small infant to an old person to "hold." This appears to be uncommon, and the only instance about which information was available occurred under the following circumstances:

A man and a woman were married with full ceremony and the best of feelings prevailed between the two families. The wife was several times rebought until she and her relatives had fully maintained their dignity, in fact the relations of the husband felt that they were being out-shone. Then the wife's father died. To mark their sympathy, the husband's family gave the widow one of her daughter's children to "hold." Valuable non-returnable presents were transmitted as "soft

"I am Ānolxmdimut," she said. "Everyone calls on me to visit the sick, and henceforth they will likewise seek you and your basin." 756 * 787 *

Something entered his stomach, causing it to heave violently, and he felt that the sickness had left him. He sent for the singers and repeated to them the words that Tlitcāplilān-a had chanted; these formed the text of the shaman's song which he used on future occasions. While giving them to the singers, he endeavoured to dance, but was too feeble to do more than weakly shake his hands. From that time on, Ānolxmdimut was able to cure the sick.

This last account is typical. Tlitcāplilān-a appears, inserts something into the body of the patient to cure him, sings one or more songs, gives the sufferer a name, and then vanishes. [553] The curing power thus bestowed remains within the person benefited; it is this that enables him to heal others if Tlitcāplilān-a has so decided. In such cases, there is mention of a "basin" in the song, and the one who has just recovered will be able to treat others, especially those suffering from the same malady as himself. [755] The reference to a basin is because such utensils are used during treatments. To the Bella Coola a shaman is one who has had such an experience and has publicly claimed it, whether or not he can cure the sick.

Tlitcāplilān-a is known by many names, in accordance with her ability to treat many diseases, and the designation she bestows depends upon the malady cured. [796] [553] The following are some of the names received from her by shamans.

Sxxanqwalpulaxslaix, "The Strengthener of the Breath." [551] This name was given to a person who was cured when he found breathing very difficult. The text of his song was:

"Tlitcāplilān-a gave me (the name) Sxxanqwalpulaxslaix with a small object to aid the breathing of the very sick." [533]

Tāmtāmslo-psta. This has the same significance as the last.

Nxmār-mālxsaix, "The Dancer Near the Fire." [551]

Ānolxmdimut, "The Dancer Who Makes Noise Only with 756 His Body." A shaman with this name does not use a rattle 787 when curing.

Awapulmut, "Quivering To and Fro." This refers to the [551] movements of a shaman when he dances for curative purposes.
[755] Kwapulktumlaic, "The Revolver." This is derived from kwapulktum, to revolve sunwise, and as this is done for curative purposes, the name really signifies, "The One Who Restores to Strength."

It is believed that Tlitxpilitx-a often uses her own discretion about visiting the sick, but that sometimes a number of the supernatural beings confer as to whether an ailing person should be helped, and if so request her to visit him. Sometimes [71] the patient is so sick that an enormous amount of power must be inserted to help him, and he dies from its receipt. In such cases he is revived by Anamitxdtum, a male being whose sole function is to restore those whom Tlitxpilitx-a has slain. This return to life has frequently occurred when relatives have been mourning the death of the patient, who is presently able to recount all that he has seen. Sometimes Tlitxpilitx-a, instead of herself bestowing power upon a sick person, carries him[1] away to a locality in which a supernatural being was petrified in the beginning of time.

756 Although it is Tlitxpilitx-a who most frequently cures a 776 sick person, there are many instances of other supernatural 787 beings having done so. Little seems to be known of these, except that they have been recorded as appearing to give a patient their name and to cure him of his malady. So far as could be ascertained, they are thought of only in connection with apparitions to the sick and, since in function they exactly resemble Tlitxpilitx-a, and as it is she who is most commonly spoken of, it is possible, or even probable, that these are actually the same being under other names. The following beings are of this type.

[1] The Bella Coola do not theorize as to the part of the person thus transported; if questioned, they conclude that it must be the spirit.

suspend the bundle by ropes from a stick which projected horizontally from the wall. It was to these ropes that Kalikka tied the bangles, so that they jingled with every movement of the child.

Alpoomtsa heard this peculiar noise from his house in the land above and sent a Sîpunt-ás, a diminutive supernatural being of human form, which lives on air, to investigate. The creature perched on the cradle rope where Kalikka saw it. Owing to his former life in the land above he knew what it was, and how to deal with it, so he quickly threw over it a blanket which he had frequently used.* This brought him supernatural good fortune. He concealed the Sîpunt-ás for safety in an old chequer-work rear sack, and left it lying on the floor.

Wealth flowed in upon him so that he was able to give a potlatch every year. At one of them he gave his infant daughter, the occupant of the cradle, the name Sîpunt-ás, which has been handed down from generation to generation, and has recently been given to a Bella Bella child. Kalikka's prosperity roused the jealousy of his fellows so that they murdered him, but his children still had the Sîpunt-ás and they continued to prosper. At last their enemies slew them too, sparing only one small boy.

This orphan led a precarious existence. He was refused admission to what had been his father's house and was forced to live in the space between the floor and the ground below, while his food was taken from the refuse heaps. In time he grew to young manhood, frequently brooding on the fate of his relatives and hoping for revenge. One day he crossed the river, ascended a mountain, and found there a large cave, where he lay down to sleep, wrapped in a bear-skin. A supernatural being came to him.

"I have watched your woes," said the stranger, "and I will help you if you are brave. You must accompany me to my land. The road is dangerous, and if you should fear me it would be disastrous to you, so keep close."

They took a difficult path down through the earth to the land of the dead below.

"I will keep you here for a night and teach you," said the supernatural one as he gave the boy a stick in which was power.

"You must take this," he said, "and go at night to your father's house. Throw the stick at one of those who killed your father. It will rebound to you, after having your enemy dead without a mark on his body. Do this every night, killing only one man at a time, until you have slain all the murderers, but be careful not to harm anyone else."

Although he had not at first revealed himself, the being from whom the lad received this shaman power was Sá-ḿa. The boy spent one night in the land below, then returned to the village, carrying the stick with him. A whole year had, of course, elapsed since his departure, so the people suspected he had been trying to obtain power. When he did not display it at once, they jeered at him, but he said nothing. That night he killed one of his father's murderers in the manner which he had been taught, and did the same every night until all who had taken part in his parent's death had been disposed of. Thus he regained his father's house and became wealthy.

The orphan had not only become a shaman through the assistance of Sá-ḿa, he had also acquired the name, Sá-ḿamate-i, carrying with it a kaxiw dance prerogative, which has but recently been forgotten. The name was last used by the father of a man now living, but he disliked it on account of its similarity to the word for "death," á-ḿa, and accordingly, altered it.* The repository (II, p. 8) of the dance was the cave wherein the vision took place; it is still called, xwawá-ḿa, "The Place of Death."

Xálálás was not the only man to whom a Sísqwá-ás appeared in the beginning of time. One appeared likewise to Talalmale (I, p. 312), in consequence of which the name Sísqwá-ás has also been preserved by the descendants of this first man. From that time until recently none of the creatures have been seen. Early in the century, however, a certain man saw one when undergoing treatment at the Hot Springs; and in 1920 a youth saw another at a cannery, but failed in his efforts to catch it. As there is a tendency for such creatures to appear only to those whose ancestors have seen them, and there is no tradition of such an occurrence in this lad's family, he was possibly mistaken. Perhaps he saw only a mouse which demonstrated its supernatural power by appearing in a peculiar form.

THE GOAT HUNTERS

Four brothers, the youngest of whom was named Nuqumalite-i, used to hunt mountain goats in the upper valley of the river which enters North Bentinck Arm at Green Bay. In some unknown fashion Nuqumalite-i realized that supernatural power had been granted to him, and accordingly determined to stay behind when his brothers went hunting. Every day the three went out after goats, but without success. They did not realize that this was because the youngest brother was keeping the dogs in camp by singing to them and giving them choice morsels of food. This went on for several weeks.

Then Nuqumalite-i said, "You stay in camp today, I will try my luck."

*Such a change would have been unthinkable before white influences had broken down the ancient customs.

CHAPTER I

WINTER CEREMONIAL DANCES

000

General Observations on the Kusiut Society — Powers and Functions of the Society — Initiation — The Ritual of Specific Dances — Various Origin Myths — Kusiut Prerogatives Other than Dances — The Death of a Kusiut — The Final Rite — Concluding Observations and History.

General Observations on the Kusiut Society

IN view of the importance of the kusiut society in the lives of the Bella Coola, it would seem logical to have described it in an earlier part of this monograph. Though an integral part of the complicated structure of social organization, it is a secret, semi-religious grouping which can best be treated separately. The word kusiut is connected etymologically, according to native belief, with siut, the term for a supernatural being. Thus the meaning of the society's designation is "The Supernatural," or "The Learned," for siut has both these significations. A member of the society is likewise called a kusiut, plural, kukusiut.

575* 575* 192 [776]

The investigator soon learns of the existence of the society. If he asks a man his name, and then inquires further what type of designation it is, the answer is always that it is his kusiut name, that is, the one by which he is known as a member of the society. Ancestral names are used only at potlatches or other ceremonial occasions, whereas an individual's kusiut appellation is the one which he uses commonly. Moreover, for about three months of every year the Bella Coola live in an atmosphere of kusiut dances with a performance, or its preliminaries, taking place almost every night. Preparations for this ceremonial season, for so it may be termed, begin four days after the September moon is full, while the actual dances commence early in November and are continued until March. During this period the kukusiut are believed to be in intimate

535 contact with supernatural beings, so that it is a time for grave
*575 thoughts and decorous behaviour. Even by day the members
796 pass from house to house with dignified mien, not loitering
[787] around the sidewalks nor indulging in frivolity. Every effort is made to prevent quarrels between members who are expected to show by their appearance and actions the gravity of the rites in which they are engaged. Night after night they assemble at the house wherein the dance is taking place; those who have performed, and are therefore most closely in touch with the supernatural, even sleep there, not returning to their own houses until March. A dance usually lasts four nights, and during that time the performer's house, in which it takes place, is termed a nuqpik, "An Empty House." The significance of this designation is unknown.

178 Membership in the society depends on a duly validated
*575 ancestral prerogative to perform one of the many kusiut dances.
[424] At the present time every Bella Coola is a kusiut, even babes in arms being initiated, but formerly no one was admitted until he or she had reached an age of discretion. Some informants went so far as to say that the hair of an initiate must have begun to turn grey, and all agreed that no one was ever admitted until at least twenty, or more often, twenty-five years of age. Initiates were frequently still older; one woman, for example, stated that her mother was past the age of child-[551] bearing before admission. Since only a member of the society could be called by a kusiut name, the uninitiated continued to be known by the ancestral names conferred on them at infancy until they received kusiut designations. The importance of the 178 society depends on the belief of the uninitiated in the super-
*575 natural powers of its members, and as there are now none to 796 impress, the rites carried out today are little more than pic-
128 tures of what took place years ago. It is the aim of the Bella Coola to carry out the dances as if uninitiated persons were in attendance, and since most of the following information was obtained from men who well remembered their sensations when not members of the society, it is justifiable to use the present

*575 Ano°likwolsaix. They may be termed marshals of the society. [424] Each must have an ancestral prerogative for this, duly vali- [776] dated by presents to the kukusiut, in addition to a kusiut prerogative of some kind. In each village there are four or five of these men. Whenever food is being served at a kusiut dance, the marshals receive theirs first and then one or other of them addresses the audience in slow and impressive style, beating on the floor with a stick to add emphasis to his words. He admonishes his fellows to safeguard the ancient rites of the society, to be bold, to be secretive, and he pays honour to the member who has given the dance. It is they who take the leading part if a youth is dragged away to the meeting-place for initiation, and it is they who arrange matters when a spy reports that a *575 non-member is over-inquisitive. If any member of the society should break one of its laws at a time when no uninitiated are 688 present, the marshal is expected to seize a burning stick from the fire and strike the offender with it. If death should result, revenge is unthinkable, since the criminal had broken the law. The same fate is unhesitatingly meted out to any kusiut who should dare to betray any of the mysteries to the uninitiated. Moreover, it is the marshals who decide whether any improper act lowers the dignity of a dance, and punish accordingly. Not many years ago a kusiut woman gave birth to a child while a dance was taking place and the infant was slain by one of the [761] marshals. The usual explanation made to the uninitiated for a death within the dance-house is that a supernatural being caused the roof to fall and kill the victim.

*575 Each marshal has, in connection with his prerogative of this vocation, a professional name, used only within the house 551 where a kusiut dance is taking place and carefully concealed [424] from the uninitiated. Some designations were obtained from Ano°likwolsaix by an ancestor of the possessor, others were created on this earth with reference to some specific event, and [553] duly made valid by presents to the kukusiut alone. Some of these names are:

Xwolsekmis, "The Destroyer," so given on account of an elaborate kusiut ritual which failed; 575* 551

Namulsta, meaning unknown;

"The One who Guards the Ritual by Gripping with his Teeth";

"The Terrifier";

"The Dog-Toothed One."

When a kusiut acts contrary to the interests of the society 575* the marshals gather in the sacred meeting-place of the village, with other senior kukusiut. 688 There is no definite order respecting who shall, or shall not, be summoned. The matter is discussed until unanimity of opinion is reached, although a marshal, particularly if he is also a rich and influential chief, is the guiding spirit. In Nusqulxwaista the supernatural being Sikiliktnum kills any supernatural kusiut who errs, so in this world it is always said that a verdict of death has been given by this being. Several of those at the meeting are sent out to lure the victim who, brought before the group, is told that he is to die. He is seized, thrown on his back, and a pole laid across his neck; two men sit on each end until the man is dead.[3] Sometimes less drastic punishments are meted out. About 177 1880, when the influence of the white man had become evident on the coast, a dancer who had been, theoretically, 575* disembowelled and was supposed to remain for months within 688 his house to recover from the operation, insisted on fleeing to Kimsquit to a woman with whom he was in love. When he returned to Bella Coola a meeting was held to decide whether or not he should be killed. Fear of the white men prevented summary punishment, but the marshals insisted that the offender submit himself to periodic scratching on the stomach with a nail so that it would appear to the uninitiated that he was suffering from a deep wound. The offender was thankful to escape thus lightly.

[3]Occasionally the relative of a condemned person saves him by saying that he must not be killed. This means that the speaker is willing to die as a substitute; he is executed in due course, but the mechanism by which the diffusion of information is stopped is not clear.

[The Dance of NoaKxnim]

773 approaches the Bella Coola River, and proceeds up it, beneath 824 the surface of the water, invisible to all. Its destination is 825 Smaien·a, whence its captain leaps to Nusqulxwaista to await the coming of Ałquntām. The crew consists of a number of supernatural beings, who will be described in connection with the ceremonial on the night of nebusam. This canoe, which brings the salmon and berries to Bella Coola, has four masts but no sails, and is enormous. Whenever the weather is fine, Noākxnum lowers first one side and then the other of his craft so that the salmon may leave; after swimming around for a time they always return, refreshed by their exercise. In former [785] times when people were purified by ceremonial chastity, sev-
[831] eral succeeded in seeing the craft, and from them it is known [787] that it is about six hundred yards in length, that it travels without leaving a wake, that any canoes passing near are sucked along after it, and that a mallard duck, perched on the bow, quacks continuously. Intelligent informants agreed that the bringing of the salmon during the autumn was inconsistent, but they could offer no explanation. One man believed that this was pointed out not many years ago by a man whose [626] patron was Noākxnum, but that the marshals requested him [776] not to upset established ritual by too much logic. Noākxnum is patron for several kukusiut, who are believed by the unini-575 tiated to be able to see his canoe. As he passes up the river 796 the kusiut dances begin.
184 It is unnecessary to describe the full ritual in each village, [424] as this is supposed to be identical, and probably contains only slight variations, if any. In Tcumotl the kusiut who has the [551] prerogative of seeing Noākxnum is a certain Qaxolān·i,[15] in Kimsquit, Ałuskinwasam,[16] and in Siskistl, Xemtnum. Although,

[115] [15]Details of this dance were learnt from the father of Qaxolān·i, who intimated
[426] that the name was a family possession. Several months later an old woman [578] referred to the lending of this designation by her father and said that the present user had failed to return it. Bitter feelings are often caused by disputes of this kind.

[16]Meaning "Cloud Covered," a reference to the invisibility of his patron, as if the latter were hidden by clouds. Many kusiut names have significances of this type.

*575 him as guide. Both heard the beating, and soon saw a pack of super-*796 natural wolves eating dog-flesh. The men were able to steal away with-424 out being observed and Hai·alakila told Ẓälsmus to say nothing about 539 what they had seen. A little later he gave a dance in which he wore a wolf's mask and pretended to eat dog-flesh. His neighbours, ignorant of the vision by which this dance had been inspired, were tremendously impressed.

Another exploit of Hai·alakila and Ẓälsmus may here be recorded, although it is unconnected with the Cannibal dance.

One night when they were spearing fish, a forest suddenly arose before them. Ẓälsmus, startled and terrified, began to cry, but Hai·alakila quieted him.

"I am master here," he said. "We are in this adventure together and your task is to keep quiet."

Then a house appeared before them from the depths of the ocean. It was really a sḳämtsk, with its ferocious mouth as doorway, and though Hai·alakila naturally feared to enter, he climbed to the roof, so that he could gaze within through what corresponded to a smoke-vent. The house was filled with valuables of all kinds, guarded only by gulls. Hai·alakila reached inside with his pole, hooked forth one object after another and swung each across to his slave on the mainland to hide in a tree. Unfortunately, a canoe happened to draw near, whereupon the house slowly sank back into the depths.

*575 Mention might here be made of a Stuux repository, said to 778 be unique in Bella Coola, that contains five Cannibal names.
●551 It is in the form of a human being with a tail, kneeling and bent forward so that hands and head touch the ground. A repository is at each point of contact. The names are:

Ẓitlia, the head of the creature; Änuximän·a, the left hand; Sinuximätl, the right hand; Älximän·a, the left foot; Xuximän·a, the right foot; Älquntäm, the tail.

In this repository there lives a mätsqus with a copper lining to its mouth.

*575 It will be seen that these myths help but little to explain
*796 the kusiut society, or even the origin of the Cannibal dances;
424 they appear to be only rationalizations attempting to account
539 for established customs. For this reason they have been inserted after a description of the Cannibal dance.

[The Scratch Dance]

obey one prohibition; he must not sleep with his wife for four days. 575* 796*

Like a Cannibal, X is liable to frenzy for the rest of the ceremonial season. During this period he remains secluded within his house, and the uninitiated willingly avoid him, believing him to be mentally deranged. He attends every kusiut dance, where his latent madness helps to frighten the uninitiated. If strangers from Kimsquit or Täl·io visit Bella Coola, he at once becomes frenzied, rushes to the beach and scratches them, precisely as a Cannibal would do; in this case he must be pacified in the same manner. A Scratcher always saves goods to recompense scratched foreigners. If it is the first time that X has danced, he must remain secluded for the following summer, and give his ceremony the next winter. During the warm months he remains within the back-room of his house, and though some of the uninitiated know of his presence, still believing him mad they do not intrude upon his privacy. The coming of foreigners during this period excites him to frenzy and he scratches them, irrespective of the time of year. [834] [828]

It might be mentioned that some Scratcher names are indicative of the dancer's function, and others, such as "The Cause of Fear," have reference to his prowess. [551]
